mind strongly alive to the violence of persecution, he formed a design of becoming a Carthusian friar. He had formerly worn the ecclesiastical habit at the Port Royal, but his confessor in this instance, with commendable sincerity, expostulated with him, and prevailed upon him to marry, and thus instead of bidding adieu to the world, to become one of its most useful and honorable members. He followed the advice, and was thus a father of seven children; but superstitiously credulous, he determined never to write for the theatre, and to complete his full atonement before the church he was reconciled to the gentlemen of the Port-royal, and all those whom satire, ill language, or jocularly had made his enemies. In spite, however, of his pious resolutions, he was prevailed upon by Mad. Maintenon to write a sacred tragedy to be acted by her young ladies at St. Cyr, and this produced Esther, and afterwards Athalie, which last was, when after his death introduced on the public theatre, rewarded with the most unbounded applause. He was in 1673 admitted member of the French academy, and in 1677 he was employed with Boileau his friend to write the history of Lewis XIV.; but the efforts of these two great geniuses proved abortive, and the work was never completed. Racine afterwards drew up the History of the Port-royal, 2 vols. 12mo, in an elegant and pleasing manner. His excessive sensibility at last proved the cause of his death. He wrote a memorial on the Miseries of the Poor, which he lent to Mad. Maintenon, but it fell accidentally into the hands of the king, who expressed his indignation at the presumption of the poet. Racine heard of the royal displeasure, and was so terrified that he fell into a fever, and though the king was very kindly inquisitive after his welfare, the disorder at last proved fatal. He died 1699, and was buried in the Port Royal monastery. A pension was honorably settled by the king on his family. He wrote besides, Canticles or Hymns, for the use of St. Cyr — Letters and Epigrams, &c. He has often been compared to Corneille, and on them Perrault observes, that if Corneille surpassed Racine in heroic sentiments, and the grand character of his personages, he was inferior to him in moving the passions, and in purity of language. His works appeared at London, 2 vols. 4to. 1723.

RACINE, Lewis, son of the poet, was honored, though an ecclesiastic, with a civil appointment, by cardinal Fleury. He died 1763, aged 71. He was himself a poet of considerable merit, and besides poems, wrote Reflections on Poetry — the Life of his Father, 2 vols. 1747 — a prose translation of Milton's Paradise Lost, and other works.

RACK, Edmund, a native of Ellingham, Norfolk, who from a spinning boy, became the menial servant, and afterwards the apprentice and journeyman of a woollen draper. The little opportunities which were allowed him for improvement were usefully and laboriously employed, and in 1758 he settled at Bradford, Essex, in business, for himself, and afterwards retired to Bath, master of an honorable competency. He here established the agricultural society, to which he became secretary, though a quaker. He wrote the Ruins of an Ancient Cathedral, a poem, 1768 — a volume of poems, 1775 — Mentor's Letters, 1777 — Poems and Essays, 1781. He also contributed materially to Collinson's History of Somersetshire, and died 1787, aged 52.

RACLE, Leonard, an architect, born at Dijon. By study and application he emerged from obscurity and acquired distinction. He joined the Reyffouze to the Saone, built the harbour of Verfoix, and in 1786 obtained the prize of the Toulouse academy, by his memoir on the erection of an iron bridge of a single arch of 400 feet span. He was the friend of Voltaire and built his house at Ferney. He declined the liberal offers of Catherine of Russia, and preferred the honors of his native country. He died at Pont-de-Vaux 1792. He wrote besides Memoirs on the Property of the Cycloid — on regulating the Course of the Rhone and the Ain, &c.

RADCLIFFE, Alexander, an officer of the army, better known as a poet. He travestied Ovid's Epistles, and wrote besides other works of low humor, such as News from Hell — the Sword's Farewell, &c. He died at London about 1700.

RADCLIFFE, John, a celebrated physician, born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1650. From the school of his native town he came to University college, Oxford; but not finding, as he expected, a vacant fellowship, he removed to Lincoln, where he became fellow. He took his master's degree in 1672, and then laboriously devoted himself to the study of medicine, botany and chemistry. In 1675, he took the degree of M. B. and began to practise with increasing reputation. In 1677, he resigned his fellowship in consequence of a quarrel with the rector of the college, upon whom he had imprudently been severe in the criticisms of his gayer hours, and in 1682, he took his degree of M. D. and two years after removed to London. Here his reputation had preceded him, he quickly became the most popular practitioner of the town, and added to his other honors the title of physician to the princess Anne of Denmark. In 1693, his marriage with the daughter of a rich citizen was prevented by the discovery of the incontinence of the fair one, and this so irritated the disappointed lover, that he ever after spoke with indifference and even contempt of the sex. When called in 1699, to attend king William, his rough address proved very offensive to the court. The king showing him his swollen ankles, asked his opinion; I would not, answered the blunt physician, have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms. Though discarded from the court, he found his practice undiminished in the town; but his popularity created him enemies, and while his opinion was consulted above that of others, his medical opponents censured him as an adventurous empiric, whom success and not merit had raised to eminence. On the last illness of queen Anne, it is said by some of his biographers that he refused to visit her, though requested by the privy council; but it seems by his own statement, that he was never solicited to attend, and that the unpopularity which consequently awaited him on the occasion of the queen's death, and the attempts to censure him in the house of commons, were totally unmerited. He died Nov. 1, 1714, aged 64, three months after the queen; and it is said that the public odium which was heaped on him in consequence of the charge of disrespect and obstinacy towards his sovereign, hastened his death. He was buried in St. Mary's church, Oxford, with great solemnity. In his character and conduct Radeliffe was violent, fickle, and avaricious. His maxim to make a fortune was to use all mankind ill; but though he practised in some degree what he taught, it has been observed, that Mead who followed a contrary rule obtained much greater opulence. The vast bulk of his fortune was left to charitable purposes; besides creating two travelling fellowships in University college, Oxford, he left ample provision for the erecting of an infirmary, and of a splendid library in his favorite city, which bear his name. The library, in the erection of which above 40,000*l.* were expended, was finished in 1747, and opened 12th April, 1749, with great academical pomp. Dr. Radcliffe was chosen member of parliament for Buckingham the year before his death.

RADGONDE, St. daughter of Bertarius, king of Thuringia, renounced, at the age of 10, paganism for the christian faith, by the direction of Clotaire who afterwards married her. She united to personal charms the most amiable virtues of private life; but such was her attachment to religious duties, that she obtained from her husband, six years after her marriage, the permission of retiring from the world and of devoting herself to the seclusion of a monastery. She died 13th Aug. 587, aged 68, at the abbey of St. Croix, after performing acts of the greatest charity and most exemplary devotion.

RADEMAKER, Gerard, a painter of Amsterdam whose pieces of architecture and perspective were much admired. He died 1711, aged 38. His relation Abraham excelled in landscape painting, and died at Haerlem, 1735, aged 60.

RAGOTZKI, Francis Leopold, prince of Transylvania, was imprisoned at Neustadt in 1701, on suspicion of attempts to make the Hungarians revolt against the emperor. He, however, escaped soon after, and from Poland repaired to Hungary, where he joined the disaffected, and was declared chief of the insurgents. Success emboldened him, and when degraded by the imperial court, and condemned to lose his head, he caused himself to be proclaimed protector of Hungary and prince of Transylvania. In 1713, when peace was restored, he retired to France, and from thence went to Constantinople, where the Turks paid great deference to him. He died at Rodos on the sea of Marmora, 8th April, 1735, aged 56. His Memoirs on the Revolutions of Hungary, in 2 vols. 4to. or six in 12mo. are interesting; but the Testament Politique & Moral which passes under his name is supposed to be a fictitious publication.

RAGUEAU, Francis, a professor of jurisprudence at Bourges, author of a Commentary on the Customs of Berry — and of an Account of the Royal Rights. He died 1605.

RAGUENET, Francis, a learned ecclesiastic of Rouen, who obtained the prize of eloquence in the French academy 1689, on the subject of the dignity and merit of martyrdom. His parallel of the Italian and French music and operas, in which he allows the superiority to the Italians, occasioned a long paper war between him and Frenuse. He died in a good old age, 1722. He wrote besides the Monuments of Rome, or a Description of the Finest Works of Painting, Sculpture, &c. of Rome, with Observations, 12mo. — History of Oliver Cromwell, 4to. — History of the Ancient Testament — History of Turenne, 12mo, &c.

RAINALDI, Oderic, a priest of the oratory, who died about 1670. He published a Continuation of Baronius, in 9 vols. fol. from 1199, to 1567.

RAINAUD, Theophilus, a jesuit, born at Sospello in Nice, 1583. He was engaged in teaching belles lettres and theology among the jesuits, and died at Lyons 31st Oct. 1663, aged 80. Though learned and well informed he was singular and capricious in his conduct, and his writings are often obscure and uninteresting. His works appeared at Lyons 1665, in 20 vols. fol.

RAINOLDS, John, an English divine, born at Pinto, Devonshire, 1549. He was of Merton college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, where he became fellow. In 1598, he was made dean of Lincoln, but the next year exchanged it for the presidency of his college. He was offered a bishopric by Elizabeth, but modestly refused it. He died 1607. He was a man of such learning, that he was called a living library, &c. His private character was exemplary for piety and every virtue. He was one of those divines employed in the translation of the bible under James I. He wrote besides Censura Librorum Apocryphorum Vet. Testamenti. — Apologia Thesium de Sacra Script. et Eccles. — de Romanæ Eccles. Idolat. in Cultu Sanctorum, &c. He had a brother William, originally of New college, who turned papist, and became Hebrew professor of the English college at Rheims. He was author of Calvino-Turcismus, 8vo. — a Defence of the Rhemish Translation of the New Testament, &c. and died at Antwerp 1594.

RALEIGH, sir Walter, an illustrious Englishman, born at Hayes, in the parish of Budley, Devonshire, 1552. He was for some time at Oriel college, Oxford; but the pursuits of ambition, and an active life were more congenial to his feelings than academical labors. In 1569, he accompanied the gentlemen volunteers whom Elizabeth sent to France to support the protestants, and there he continued for nearly six years. Though afterwards he resided in the Middle Temple he paid no attention to the law; but in 1578, embarked for the Netherlands with the troops sent against the Spaniards, and the next year he went with his half-brother sir Humphrey Gilbert, on an expedition to discover and colonize some part of North America. The plan did not succeed, and in 1580, he engaged as captain in the wars of Ireland, and became one of the commissioners for the government of Munster in lord Ormond's absence. On his return to England he became a favorite of the court by his polite attention and gallantry to the queen. Walking in the number of her attendants, he extricated her from a dirty part of the road which she was afraid to cross, by spreading his new plush cloak on the ground, over which she gently trod and passed clean and dry. This courtesy gained him the queen's favor, and he gradually rose to places of honor and distinction. In 1583, he sailed again with his brother Gilbert in an expedition to Newfoundland; but though his companions were attacked by a contagious disease, and his brother was drowned on his return, he still was animated with the desire of new discoveries. In 1514, therefore, he obtained letters patent, and sailed to America, where he discovered Wigandacoa, which was called Virginia, in honor of his virgin mistress, and in this country he afterwards in a second and third voyage settled flourishing colonies. He had been chosen member of parliament for Devonshire in 1584, and knighted, and now the favor of the queen appointed him senechal of Cornwall, and warden of the Stannaries; but the wish to improve navigation by the discovery of the North West passage, and by visiting distant countries, was still the ruling object of his ambition. A fourth and a fifth expedition were fitted out to Virginia; and if he had done no other service to the nation, his recommendation of tobacco, which he first introduced into the country from Virginia, would in a commercial point of view have procured him high distinction. In 1588, his courage was eminently displayed against the Spanish armada, to the destruction of which he ably contributed, and the following year he was employed with a fleet in the restoration of Don Antonio the expelled king of Portugal. In 1592, he was at the head of the expedition sent to attack the Spaniards at Panama, and on his return he became an active and eloquent speaker in the house of commons; but he incurred the displeasure of the clergy, and the public odium by accepting the grant of the manor of Sherborne, which formerly belonged to the see of Salisbury. Though stigmatized by his enemies with the name of atheist, it appears, however, that he was a zealous asserter of God and of his providence. In 1593, he highly offended the queen by an amour with one of her maids of honor, daughter of sir Nicolas Throgmorton; but after being imprisoned for several months, he made due reparation for his violation of decorum, by marrying the lady, with whom he lived in the enjoyment of uninterrupted domestic harmony. He engaged in 1595, in the discovery and conquest of Guiana in South America, and after storming the city of St. Joseph, and taking the Spanish governor prisoner, he returned to England. He was afterwards employed against Cadiz, and then became active in his opposition to Essex, and greatly contributed to the defeat of his treasonable designs; but on the death of the queen his happiness was at an end. On the accession of James, Raleigh was not only stripped of his honors, but tried and condemned for high treason, on charges not only frivolous, but oppressive and arbitrary. Though deprived he remained for several years a prisoner in the Tower, while his estates were lavished on Car, the royal favorite. During his long captivity, which was soothed by the attentions of his wife, the heroic prisoner devoted himself to literary pursuits, and wrote some valuable works, among which is his History of the World, of which the first volume appeared in 1614, fol. In 1616, after a confinement of nearly 13 years, this illustrious character was permitted to leave his prison, and James, as if pretending first to discover his merits, sent him on an expedition to explore the golden mines of Guiana. The affair proved unfortunate, for Walter lost his eldest son, who was killed by the Spaniards at St. Thomas, and after destroying the town, which was burnt against his orders, he returned home to meet the most cruel and arbitrary treatment. Incensed at his conduct, the Spaniards were loud in their complaints by Gundamor their ambassador, and James ordered Raleigh to be seized. Though no blame could attach to him for his conduct in Guiana, the king, determined on his punishment, ordered his execution on his former attainder. In vain the unfortunate leader pleaded in his defence, and asserted that his life could not be taken away in consequence of a sentence passed 15 years before, and which had been revoked, since in his late expedition, the king had granted him power of life and death over his crew. Nothing, however, prevailed, and the pusillanimous James either to please the vindictive Spaniards, or to gratify his own personal enmity, assented to his death, and thus brought eternal disgrace upon his otherwise illustrious reign. This injured hero was beheaded in old palace yard, 29th Oct. 1618, and suffered with great magnanimity. His body was interred in St. Margaret's Westminster, but his head was preserved for several years in his family. Without hesitation Sir Walter must be pronounced one of the greatest and most useful characters of these times. His perseverance in making discoveries and in visiting foreign countries first inspired the nation with that ardor after maritime distinction, which has since not only increased its commerce and prosperity, but raised its glory to the most exalted rank. He was distinguished not only as a bold navigator and a valiant leader, but as an able negotiator; and as a man of letters his valuable works, composed in the obscurity of a dungeon, on subjects of history, politics, geography, and philosophy, as well as some respectable poetical pieces, will transmit his name with honor to the most distant posterity. His son Carew, who was born in the Tower, was author of some sonnets, and he wrote also a Defence of his Father against the Attacks of James Howell. He was made governor of Jersey in 1659, and died 1666.

RALPH, James, a miscellaneous writer, originally a school-master at Philadelphia. He came to London in the beginning of the second George's reign, and wrote himself to notice. His "Night," a poem, and some theatrical pieces, were received with applause. His History of England possesses merit, and some of his political pamphlets for a time enjoyed popularity. He died of the gout, Jan. 24th, 1762 at Chiswick. He was one of the heroes of Pope's Dunciad.

RAMAZZINI, Bernardin, an Italian physician, born at Capri, near Modena, 1633. He studied and took his degrees at Parma, and after visiting Rome, settled at Modena, where he became medical professor, and practised with great success. In 1700 he removed to Padua, and though blind, discharged the duties of professor with great applause. He died 1714, upon his birth day, 5th Nov. aged 81. His works appeared at London, 1716, in 4to.

RAMEAU, John Philip, a celebrated musician, born at Dijon, 25th Sept. 1683. He at first travelled over the country with a strolling company, and afterwards was made organist of Clermont cathedral in Auvergne. He now studied the principles of his art with great success, and produced his treatise on Harmony, and his New System of Music. In 1750 he gave to the public his famous "Demonstration of the Principles of Harmony," in which he makes the whole depend on a single and clear principle, the fundamental base, and for this excellent work he has been deservedly called the Newton of that science. He was made manager of the opera at Paris, and for his great merit appointed composer to Lewis XV. and by him honored with the order of St. Michael, and raised to the rank of nobility. He died at Paris, Sept. 12, 1764. He was a man of exemplary character, a good husband, and a benevolent neighbour. As a theorist he is deservedly admired by Handel, but as a composer some dispute his merit.

RAMELLI, Felix, a native of Asti, who though an ecclesiastic became an eminent painter, and was highly honored at the court of the king of Sardinia for the excellence of his highly finished miniature portraits. He died 1740, aged 74.

RAMSAY, Andrew Michael, called also the chevalier Ramsay, was a Scotchman, born at Ayr, 9th June, 1686. He studied at Edinburgh, and was tutor to Lord Wemyss's son at St. Andrew's, and afterwards travelled to Leyden, where the conversation of Poiret the mystic divine, shook his religious principles. In 1710, he visited the celebrated Fenelon at Cambray, and became by his persuasion a convert to the catholic faith, and in consequence of this connection obtained the place of tutor to the duke of Chateau Thierry, and to the prince of Turenne, and was made knight of St. Lazarus. He was afterwards at Rome engaged in the education of the children of the pretender called there James III. but soon after returned to Scotland, where he was favorably received. In 1730, he was honored by the university of Oxford with a doctor's degree, and afterwards returned to France, and died in the service of his patron, the duke of Turenne, at St. Germain-en-laie, 6th May, 1743. He wrote Discourse sur la Poësie Epique — la Vie de Fenelon, in return for the influence of that learned prelate in his conversion — Essay sur le Gouvernement Civil — les Voyages de Cyrus, the best of his works — Histoire de M. de Turenne — la Psychometre, or Reflections on Lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics, besides a Plan of Education, and Philosophical Principles of natural and revealed Religion, 2 vols. 4to. and smaller pieces.

RAMSAY, Charles Lewis, a Scotchman, author of a treatise on short-hand writing, dedicated to Lewis XIV. and translated into French, Paris 1681.

RAMSAY, Allan, a Scotch poet, born at Peebles, 1696. He was originally a barber at Edinburgh; but possessing emulation, and a strong genius, he devoted himself to the muses, and was honored with the patronage of the great and the learned. Of all his poems the most deservedly known is his "Gentle Shepherd," a pastoral comedy, which was first acted at Edinburgh 1719, and which for merit, simplicity, and elegance is most universally admired. For some time the poet kept a bookfeller's shop, but retired in his old age, and and died a private man 1763, aged 67. His poems form 2 vols. 4to. and his songs 4 vols.

RAMSDEN, Jesse, a native of Halifax, Yorkshire, son of a clothier. In 1751, at the age of 21 he abandoned his father's business and came to London to be an engraver, and then applied himself to the making of mathematical instruments, in which he showed great skill and ingenuity. He was admitted fellow of the Royal society 1786. His improvements in the theodolite, the barometer, Halley's quadrant, and other mathematical and optical instruments were very important to science, and he acquired no little celebrity from his astronomical apparatus and quadrants.

RAMUS, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Vermandois in Picardy 1515. Though of a respectable family, his parents were poor; but such was his devotion to literature, that rather than abandon it, he was content to attend the college of Navarre at Paris in the humble character of a servant. Assiduity, however, overcame every difficulty, and when a candidate for his master's degree he boldly attacked the prejudices of the times, by assuming for his thesis that all that Aristotle had written was false. This kindled a violent disturbance in the university of Paris, where Aristotle's works were regarded as the effusion of more than human powers, and the young professor was not only accused of intentions of sapping religion, but he was forbidden to teach philosophy; and that his disgrace might be more publicly known, the sentence was published in every street in Paris, and his person and character exposed to ridicule on the stage. He, however, was gradually restored to public favor, and in 1551, was made Royal professor of philosophy and eloquence, but the Sorbonne viewed with a jealous eye his elevation, and when he attempted an innovation in the pronunciation of Latin, by pronouncing Quisquis with the sound of the Q, and not Kis-kis as in the old way, he was exposed to great virulence, till the matter being referred to a court of justice, was dismissed; and every person allowed to pronounce his words as he pleased. When Ramus deserted the catholic religion for the protestant, he exposed himself to fresh persecutions, and was in consequence driven from his professorship; but though afterwards restored for a while to favor, he found himself still attacked by new injuries, and at last fell by the hands of the assassins in the massacre of St. Bartholomew 1572. His body after being, it is said, thrown out of a window, having the bowels dispersed about the streets, was dragged with every species of ignominy by his Aristotelian adversaries, and thrown into the Seine. He wrote various learned works, the best known of which are treatises on Arithmetic and Geometry — de Militia Cæsaris — de Moribus Veterum Gallorum — Grammars in Latin, French, and Greek, &c. As a scholar and mathematician he was very respectable, and his followers, called Ramists, for a while became very numerous in England and Scotland, and particularly in Germany.

RAMUSIO, John Baptist, secretary of the council of 10 in the Venetian republic, died at Padua 1557, aged 72. He was author of a treatise de Nili Incremento — a Collection of Maritime Voyages, in 3 vols. fol. in Italian. He was for some time ambassador from Venice to France, Rome, and Switzerland.

RANC, John, a native of Montpellier, admired as a painter. He was a great favorite in Spain, and was chief painter to the king. He died at Madrid 1735.

RANCE, Armand John le Boutillier de, a French ecclesiastic, born at Paris, 9th Jan. 1626. He was so well skilled in Grecian literature, that at the age of 13 he published an edition of Anacreon with notes; but after taking orders and being presented to some abbey, he gave way to his licentious inclinations, and became an abandoned sensualist. Returning once from a distant voyage, he entered privately the apartments of his mistress, but instead of finding the usual caresses of affection, he saw her head in a platter, cut off because a small leaden coffin could not contain the length of her dead body. This sudden shocking sight operated so powerfully upon his feelings that he retired to a monastery, and devoted the rest of life to reform and improve the monks of la Trappe. He died there in the midst of his society 26th Oct. 1700, much and deservedly respected. He published a translation of the works of Dorothee, 8vo. — Explanation of St. Benedict's Rules — Instructions and Maxims — Moral Reflections on the Four Gospels, in 4 vols. &c.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, a native of Kent, educated at Christ-church, and made master of Broadgate hall, Oxford 1549. He was disgraced by Mary on account of his religion, but his abilities as a negotiator were employed by Elizabeth in France, Russia, and Scotland, and he was knighted for his services, and made chamberlain of the exchequer and master of the posts. He died 1590, aged 60. He wrote an Account of his Embassy in Russia, 1568, inserted in Hakluyt's Voyages — Letters, Instructions, &c.

RANDOLPH, Thomas, an English poet, born at Newnham, Northamptonshire, 1605, where his father was steward to lord Zouch. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He possessed great genius, but unfortunately was too much addicted to pleasure, and thus shortened his life. He was the friend and favorite of Ben Jonson, who often called him his son, and in his poems he displayed all the vivacity of a genuine wit. He died 1634, when not yet 30. His works, among which is the "Muse's Looking Glass," a superior comedy, and three other dramatic pieces, were collected by his brother Robert, of which the fourth edition appeared in 1664. Robert himself was a poet, and was of Christ-church, Oxford, and became rector of Donnington, Lincolnshire, where he died 1671, aged 60.

RANNEQUIN, N. a celebrated engineer, born at Liege, 1648, and known for the machine of Marly which raised water to the top of a hill 502 feet above its level, and with such power that not less than 5258 tons are forced up every 24 hours. This able man died 1708.

RANS, Bertrand de, a native of Rheims, who, after living in deep solitude as a hermit in the forests of Parthenay and Tournay, imposed himself in 1226 upon the credulity of the people as the emperor Baldwin I. of Constantinople, who about 20 years before had been defeated by the Bulgarians, and put to death. Though the daughter of Baldwin, who was governor of Flanders, discovered his artifice, the imposture prevailed, vailed, and Rans was acknowledged by the Flemish nobility as their lawful sovereign. At last deception ceased, and the usurper, when tortured, confessed his guilt, and was hanged at Lille.

RANTZAN, Johas, a noble native of Holstein, who left the Danish service for the French, and was made marshal of the kingdom by Lewis XIII. He was wounded and lost an eye 1636 at Dole, and afterwards lost an arm, a leg, and one of his ears. In 1645 he became a protestant, and died five years after in prison. He is chiefly known as the active instrument by whom the protestant religion was established in Denmark.

RAUX, John, a native of Montpellier, eminent as a painter of historical pieces, and of portraits. He was of the Paris academy of painting, and died at Paris 1734, aged 57.

RAPHAEL, d'Arezzio, a native of Arezzio, the pupil of Zuccherò, admired as an historical and portrait painter. He died 1580, aged 28.

RAPHAEL, Sanzio, an illustrious painter, born at Urbino, on Good Friday, 1483. His father was a painter, and under him and Perugino he first began to cultivate his talents, after which he visited Siena, and Florence, to see the incomparable works of Leonardo da Vinci, and Michael Angelo. By studying thus the best masters, he soon rose to eminence and reputation, and merited the appellation of the divine Raphael. He also excelled as an architect, and was employed by Leo X. in the building of St. Peter's at Rome, and he enjoyed the patronage and esteem not only of the popes, but of Francis I. of France, and of other princes. He unfortunately was too much given to licentious pleasures, which at last hurried him to an untimely grave, on his birth day 1520. He was buried in the Rotunda at Rome, where these two lines by Bembo mark his tomb:

Ille hic est Raphael, timuit quo sospite vinci

Rerum magna parens, et moriente mori.

He surpassed, says a connoisseur, all modern painters, because he possessed more of the excellent parts of painting, and above all he possessed the graces in so advantageous a manner, that he has never since been equalled by any other.

RAPHELINGIUS, Francis, a learned Fleming. He studied the oriental languages at Paris, and was Greek professor at Cambridge. He was afterwards corrector of the press to Christopher Plantin, whose daughter he married, and he was concerned in the publication of the famous Antwerp Hebrew bible, printed 1571. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew and Arabic at Leyden, and died there 20th July, 1597. His works besides are, a Hebrew Grammar — an Arabic Lexicon — a Chaldee Lexicon, &c.

RAPIN, Nicolas, a French poet, born at Fontenaille-Comté, Poitou. He was the favorite of Henry III. by whom he was made provost of Paris, from which he was expelled by the league, but afterwards restored by Henry IV. His works, which were elegantly written, consisted of odes, epigrams, and elegies. He attempted to banish rhyme from the French poetry, and to write after the Greek and Latin metre. He died 1609. His poems are among the Delices des Poetes Latins de France.

RAPIN, Renatus, a learned jesuit, born at Tours, 1621. He taught for nine years polite literature with success, and wrote Latin with great elegance. His poem on Gardens, in four books, has been translated into English by Evelyn, and also by Gardiner. This and his other poems, consisting of odes, sacred eclogues, &c. were published 2 vols. 12mo. 1681. His treatises on Polite Literature were translated from the French into English, by B. Kennet, 2 vols. 8vo. They contain well written comparisons between Demosthenes and Cicero on eloquence, between Homer and Virgil, &c. and are intended to restore good taste, and polite studies in France. He died at Paris 1687.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, Paul de, a Frenchman, known as an eminent historian, born at Castres, Languedoc, 1661, and descended from an ancient family in Savoy. He studied at Puylaurens and Saumur, and then, after the example of his father, who was an advocate of respectability, he applied himself to the law. He afterwards abandoned the law for the profession of arms, but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he left France, and came to England in 1686; but after a short stay in London, he went to Holland, where he enlisted in a company of French volunteers. He accompanied William III. into England, and served in the army in Ireland, and was at the battle of the Boyne, and the siege of Limerick, where he was wounded. In 1693 he became tutor to the son of the earl of Portland, with a pension of 100l. from the king, and the promise of greater patronage, which he never received. He travelled over Europe with his pupil, and married at the Hague, where he settled for some time. In 1707 he retired to Wezel in the duchy of Cleves, with his family, and there devoted himself for 17 years to the completion of his History of England. His health suffered by his great application, and the attack of a fever carried him to his grave after a week's illness, 1725. He left one son and six daughters. He published before his death 8 vols. 4to. of his history, to the death of Charles I. and two more were added in 1724. This history has been translated by Tindal, and published in 8vo. and in folio, with a continuation to 1760, and notes, and also by J. Kelly, in 2 vols. folio. As an historian, Rapin has his admirers and detractors, and while admired by some for moderation, he is charged by others with tediousness and obscurity. Voltaire has said of him, that he was the author of the best and most impartial history of England that had hitherto appeared.

RASTAL, John, an eminent printer, born in London, and educated at Oxford. He wrote a Description of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in the form of a drama, with cuts — and also Canones Astrologici — Dialogues concerning Purgatory — Rules of a good Life — Anglorum Regum Chronicum — Apology against John Fryth, &c. — He married a sister of the great sir Thomas More, and died 1536. His son William was one of the justices of the King's Bench under Mary, and at her death retired to Louvain. He published a Chronological Table from the Conqueror — the Chartuary 1580 — Terms of the English Law — Collection of Statutes — the Life of sir Thomas More, &c.

RATER, Anthony, an eminent architect of Lyons. His abilities were employed in beautifying and adding to the conveniences of his native city; but he had the misfortune before his death to see his fellow-citizens proseribed, and the places which he had embellished laid in ashes by the murderous hands of the revolutionary anarchists. He died at Miribel, near Lyons, 4th Aug. 1794, aged 65.

RATRANUS, a monk of the abbey of Corbie in the ninth century. He published two books on predestination, against Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, which are inserted in the Vindiciæ Predestinationis, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides, treatises on the Conception of Christ — and on Transubstantiation, a work much quoted by the Calvinists.

RAVAILLAC, Francis, a native of Angouleme, who took the habit of the Feuillans, a society from which he was soon after expelled on account of his irregularities. The excesses and the fanatical discourses of the advocates of the league had so deranged his understanding, that he formed a most inveterate hatred against Henry IV. and determined to cut him off. Full of melancholy fury he came to Paris, and for some days followed the monarch to commit his horrid purpose. On the fatal 14th May, 1610, when the royal carriage was stopped in the street by some waggoners, the murderer raised himself upon the wheels of the chariot, and with two blows stabbed the monarch to the heart. He was seized by the duke of Epernon, and condemned to be torn to pieces by four horses. The dreadful sentence was executed the following 27th May, and he declared to the last, that he had no accomplices in the cruel deed.

RAVENNAS, Agnellus, or Andreas, author of a crude history of the bishops of Ravenna, of which he was a native. He was abbot of a monastery there, and died before the middle of the ninth century.

RAVESTYEN, John, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague about 1560. His portraits were much admired. — There were two others of his name, Hubert, born at Dordrecht 1647, whose fairs, markets, &c. were in high esteem, and Nicholas, born at Bommel in 1661, who chiefly excelled in portraits, and in historical pieces.

RAVIUS, Christian, a native of Berlin, who travelled into the East, where he learned the Persian, Turkish, and Arabian languages, and collected valuable MSS. On his return to Europe, he became professor of oriental languages at Utrecht, afterwards at Kiel, and at Frankfort on the Maine, where he died 21st June 1677, aged 64. He was also one of the learned correspondents of queen Christina. He wrote a Plan of Hebrew Orthography and Etymology — a Grammar, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, and English, London, 8vo. — a Latin translation from the Arabic of Apollonius Pergæus. — His son John was librarian to the elector of Brandenburg, and was author of a Commentary on Cornel. Nepos — of Military Aphorisms — and other works.

RAULIN, Joseph, physician to the French king, and member of several learned societies, died at Paris, 12th April 1784, aged 76. He published treatises on Diseases occasioned by Variations of the Atmosphere — on the Vapors in Females — on the Fluor Albus — on the Preservation of Infants — on Diseases in Lying-in-Women — Pulmonary Consumption — Comparison of the Mineral Waters of France and Germany, &c. — There was an ecclesiastic of that name, John, who died at Cluni 1514, aged 71. He wrote sermons in a weak style — Another, John Facond, who was a Spaniard, in the 17th century, and wrote an Ecclesiastical History of Malabar, 4to.

RAUWOLF, Vid. RAWWOLF.

RAWLET, John, B. D. an English divine, lecturer of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, a place which he refused to quit for the living of Colehill, Warwickshire. He wrote the Christian Monitor, an excellent book, often edited — and a treatise on Sacramental Covenanting, and died 1686, aged 44.

RAWLEY, William, D. D. chaplain to Charles I. and II. and also to the great Bacon, and the editor of his works, was born at Norwich 1588. He was educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow, and in 1616 obtained the rectory of Landbeach, near Cambridge, from which he was expelled during the rebellion, but replaced at the restoration. He died there 18th June, 1667.

RAWLINS, Thomas, engraver of the mint during the reign of the second Charles, was author of three dramatic pieces, Rebellion — Tom Essence — and Tunbridge Wells, and died 1670.

RAWLINSON, Thomas, knt. descended of an ancient family in Lancashire, was born at London, March, 1647. He was sheriff, and in 1706 lord mayor of the city, and he rendered his name memorable by repairing and beautifying the Guildhall. He died 2d Nov. 1705. He was father of 15 children by his wife, Mary, daughter of Richard Taylor, esq.

RAWLINSON, Thomas, a judicious collector of books, and a liberal patron of learning, and of learned men. While in Gray's inn, he had four chambers filled with his valuable collections, and he removed to London-house, Aldersgate-street, which, though once the palace of a bishop, could scarce contain the number of his books. He died there, 6th Aug. 1725, aged 44. His library was disposed of by auction after his death, and his MSS. took 16 days in the sale, and the books a much greater portion of time. Addison alluded satirically to him in the 158th number of the Tatler, under the character of Tom Folio.

RAWLINSON, Richard, fourth son of sir Thomas, was an eminent antiquary, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he took, by diploma, the degree of L.L. D. in 1719. This indefatigable man made a collection for the enlargement of A. Wood's Historia & Antiquitates Oxon. and for the continuation of the Athenæ Oxonienses, and History of Oxford, and he assisted liberally his contemporary antiquaries in the completion of their works. He also published a translation of Frenoy's New Method of studying History, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. — and the English Typographer, &c. 8vo. He also founded in 1750 an Anglo-Saxon professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed to the university all his books, papers, MSS. seals, and curious and valuable collections. He died at Islington, 6th April, 1755. He was also a great benebenefactor to Hertford college, and particularly to St. John's college, to which he left an estate worth 700l. per annum. His heart, according to his direction, was placed in a beautiful urn against the wall of St. John's chapel, and his body deposited in a vault in St. Giles's church, Oxford. In his right hand was placed the head of counsellor Layer, which he had purchased for a large sum, when it had been blown off from Temple Bar, where, after his execution for treason, it had been placed 1722. Dr. Rawlinson's printed books were sold in 1756. The sale lasted 50 days, and that of the pamphlets 10 days more.

RAWLINSON, Christopher, eminent for his knowledge of Saxon and Northern literature, was born at Springfield, Essex, 13th June, 1677, of an ancient family, situated at Clarkhall, Lancashire. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and published, whilst there, an edition of Alfred's Saxon translation of Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ, 8vo. He left a valuable collection of MSS. respecting the counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland. He died 8th Jan. 1732-3 aged 55, and was buried in the abbey church of St. Alban's.

RAWWOLF, Leonard, a native of Augsburg, who, in pursuit of botanical knowledge, travelled into Syria, Judæa, Arabia, and other Eastern countries, where he obtained a great number of curious plants. On his return to Europe 1576, he removed to Lintz, and gained some reputation as a medical practitioner, and was made physician to the archdukes of Austria. He died 1606. His Travels were published at Frankfurt, 1582, in 4to. which were translated into English by Staphorst, 1693, and afterwards by Mr. Ray. The catalogue of his plants was published by J. F. Gronovius at Leyden, 1755, under the name of Flora Orientalis, 8vo.

RAY or WRAY, John, an eminent English naturalist, born at Black Notley, near Braintree, Essex, 1628. Though but the son of a blacksmith he was well educated at Braintree school, and in 1644, he entered at Catherine hall, Cambridge, from which two years after he removed to Trinity college, where he obtained a fellowship. As he distinguished himself in the university by his application, he was in 1651 made Greek lecturer of his college, and two years after mathematical reader, and in 1655 humanity reader. Not only, however, the business of the college commanded his attention, but he devoted himself particularly to botany and the universal history of nature, and in 1660, published a catalogue of the Cambridge plants. To enlarge his knowledge of plants he travelled over the greater part of England, Wales, and Scotland, and in these journeys was generally accompanied by his pupil and friend, Mr. Willoughby, by sir Philip Skipton, and Mr. P. Courthope. At the restoration he took orders, but two years after he resigned his fellowship, as he refused to subscribe against the solemn league and covenant. In 1663, he embarked for the continent, where he continued about three years with his learned pupil, in pursuit of botanical knowledge, of which he published an account in 1673. In 1667, he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and contributed much by his valuable communications to the philosophical transactions. In 1672 he lost his worthy friend Willoughby, and the following year he married the daughter of Mr. Oakley, of Launton, Oxon, though nearly 24 years younger than himself. After superintending for some time the education of his friend Mr. Willoughby's children at Middleton hall, he removed to Sutton Colfield, and then to Falborne hall, Essex, and in 1679 settled in his native place, where he died 17th Jan. 1704-5. As a botanist Ray has acquired great and deserved celebrity, and his writings are held in high estimation. To strong benevolence of heart he added great humility of mind and modesty of manners, and in his character he was so amiable that those who knew him respected him, not so much for his literary acquirements, as from personal friendship. The best known of his works are the Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation, 8vo. edited three times — three Discourses on the Primitive Chaos, the Creation, Deluge, and Conflagration of the World, 8vo. — Synopsis Methodica Animalium, Quadrupedum, Avium, & Piscium — Rawwolf's Travels into the East translated, 8vo. — Persuasive to a Holy Life, 8vo. — Collection of English Proverbs, often reprinted, 8vo. — Catalogue of English Plants — Nomenclator Classicus, for the use of his friend's sons — Observations, Topographical, Moral, &c. in foreign Countries — Discourse on Seeds and the Differences of Plants — Methodus Plantarum Nova — Historia Plantarum Generalis — Fasciculus Stirpium Britannicarum — Synopsis Methodica, &c. He also assisted Mr. Willoughby in his History of Birds, Fishes, &c. and after his death, his History of Insects appeared in 4to. under the care of Dr. Derham — and also a collection of Philosophical Letters between him and his friends, 8vo. — and his Select Remains were published in 1760, 8vo. by Mr. Scott.

RAY, Benjamin, an ingenious and learned man, but very ignorant of the world. He was born at Spalding in Lincolnshire, and educated there and at St. John's college, Cambridge. When in orders, he became curate of Surfleet, and of Cowbitt. He wrote an Account of a Water Spout observed in Deepingfen, inserted in the philosophical transactions. He wrote other things, never printed. He died at Spalding, 1760.

RAYMOND, Robert, lord, a learned lawyer, raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench. He wrote Reports, &c. held in high reputation, and died 1733.

RAYNAL, William Francis, a distinguished French historian, born at St. Genies, in Rouergue, 1718. He early entered among the jesuits, and became a popular preacher; but his love of liberty and independence was too great to continue in the confinement of a cloister, and he left the society in 1748, and settled at Paris. Here determined to support himself by his pen, he wrote Literary Anecdotes, 3 vols. and Memoirs of Ninon de L'Enclos, and was engaged in the Mercur de France; but as he had greater partiality for commercial occupations, he devoted himself more closely to that subject, and in 1770, published his History Philosophical and Political of the Establishment, and of the Commerce of the Europeans in the East and West Indies. This work was received with general approbation; but while the style, and the language guage were admired, his calculations were discovered to be erroneous, his principles suspicious, and his conclusions false. To correct and improve, therefore, a composition which embraced so many concerns of policy and commerce, he travelled over France, Holland, and England, in pursuit of information, and of well attested facts. His reputation was such, that in England, the speaker of the commons observing him among the spectators, suspended the business of the house, till he had seen the historian placed in a more commodious seat. On his return he published a new edition of his work at Geneva, in 10 vols. 8vo.; but though corrected in some parts, his severe language against governments drew upon him the censure of the parliament of Paris, and not only his history was burnt with ignominy, but his person was ordered to be seized. He was, however, allowed sufficient time to make his escape, and he went to reside in Germany, and received marks of favor and protection from the king of Prussia, and from the empress of Russia, though he had spoken of them with sarcastic indifference. In 1788 he returned to Paris, and viewing the rapid progress of the constituent assembly, in the destruction of whatever was venerable and useful in the French monarchy, he had the boldness, in 1791, to address a letter to that body, and in firm and energetic language, he censured the imprudence of their proceedings. This magnanimous appeal to the sense of the legislators was ridiculed as the effusion of dotage; but it proved too prophetic of the calamities which followed. Displeased with the tumults of the capital, the venerable philosopher retired to Passy, where he expired 6th March, 1796, aged 84. Though the favorite of great men, and of princes, he died in poverty, and the only property found belonging to him, was an assignat of 50 livres, worth not three pence in ready money. His reputation, nevertheless, will be immortal, and though he is to be censured for his opinions, which are often licentious and sceptical, his writings possess vigor, clearness, and elegance, and exhibit the nervous powers of an ardent imagination, and the striking features of a rapid invention. He published besides, an History of the Stadtholderate, 2 vols. — History of the English Parliament, 2 vols. 12mo. — Historical Anecdotes from the Age of Charles V. 3 vols. 12mo. — History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. — Ecole Militaire — Historical Memoirs of Europe — History of the Revolutions of the English American Colonies, 2 vols. It is said, that he had written besides, an History of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which he partly destroyed during the reign of the sanguinary Robespierre.

RAYNARD, Theophilus, a native of Sospello, in Nice, who became a jesuit, and professor of belles lettres and theology in the society. He died at Lyons, 31st Oct. 1663, aged 80. He wrote Tables for Sacred and Prophane History, &c. His works form 20 vols. folio, printed Lyons, 1665.

RAYSSIGUIER, N. a French dramatic writer, whose Aminta, Astrea, &c. were represented on the Paris theatres between 1730 and 1735, with some applause.

READ, Alexander, an eminent Scotch physician, created by royal mandate, M. D. in the university of Oxford, 1620. He wrote some valuable works on medical and anatomical subjects, and died 1680.

REAL, Casar Richard de St. a French writer, born at Chamberri. He came early to France, and afterwards visited England. After living some time at Paris, he returned to Chamberri, and died there, 1692, very old and poor. He possessed great abilities, and was well acquainted with history and literature. He wrote Discourses on History — Don Carlos, an historical novel — Account of the Conspiracy of the Spaniards against the Venetian republic — the Life of our Saviour — Discourse on Valor — treatise on Criticism — Apostacy of Geneva, &c. all which were published together, in 5 vols. 4to. 1722, at the Hague, and also at Paris, 1745, with his letters to Atticus.

REAL, Gaspar de, seigneur de Curban, author of a valuable work on the science of government, in 8 vols. 4to. was born at Sisteron, and died at Paris, 8th Feb. 1752, aged 70. His nephew, the abbé, was also born at Sisteron, and died 1774, aged 73, author of a Dissertation on the Name of the Royal Families of France and Spain, 1762, in 12mo.

REAUMUR, René Anthony Ferchault sieur de, a French philosopher, born at Rochelle, of a good family, 1683. He studied philosophy at Poitiers, and the law at Bourges; but his inclinations led him particularly to the pursuits of mathematics and physics, and for that purpose he removed to Paris. His high reputation as a philosopher, procured him a seat in the academy of sciences at Paris, 1708, and he repaid the honor by contributing largely to their memoirs. He died in 1757, in consequence of a fall. His works were very ingenious, and therefore much admired. The best is his History of Insects, 6 vols. 4to. besides a History of the Rivers of France, &c.

REBOULET, Simon, a native of Avignon. He was brought up among the jesuits, but left them on account of bad health, and afterwards married. He was author of Histoire des Filles de l'Enfance, 2 vols. 12mo. — Memoires du Chevalier de Forbin, 2 vols. — Histoire de Louis XIV. 3 vols. 4to. — Histoire de Clement XI. 2 vols. 4to. &c. He died at Paris, 1752, aged 65.

RECORDE, Robert, an English mathematician, who sometimes practised as physician. He is the first English writer on Algebra. He died in the king's bench prison, 1558.

REDE, William, bishop of Chichester, in 1369, was eminent as a mathematician, and built the first library of Merton college, where he had been brought up, and also Ambarley-castle.

REDI, Francis, an Italian physician, born at Arezzo, 1626. He studied at Florence, and then at Pisa, where he became doctor of philosophy and medicine. Though in great reputation as the physician of Ferdinand II. duke of Tuscany, he devoted much of his time to literature, and assisted greatly in the compilation of the Crusca dictionary. He published Experiments on the Generation of Animals, 4to. — Observations on Vipers — Experiments on Natural Curiosities brought from India, 4to. &c. He was not only a learned man, but the liberal patron of learning. He was found dead in his bed, 1697.

REDI, Thomas, a Florentine painter of eminence, whose pieces are chiefly preserved in the churches of Tuscany. He died 1728, aged 63.

REGA, Henry Joseph, professor of medicine, and physician at Louvain, was author of various treatises of merit, on his profession. De Urinis Tractatus duo — Sympathia, seu de Consensu Partium Humani Corporis. 12mo. — Accurata Methodus medendi per Aphorismos Proposita, 4to. — Dissertatio Medica de Aquis Mineral. Fontis Marimont, &c. He died at Louvain, 1754, aged 64.

REGIOMONTANUS, an eminent astronomer, whose real name was John Mullerus, born at Konigsberg, Franconia, 1436. He studied at Leipzig, and then removed to Vienna, where he was the pupil, and afterwards the successor of the famous Purbachius, the professor. To be able to read Ptolemy, he travelled in the suite of cardinal Bessarion to Italy, and began to learn Greek under Beza; and after visiting the universities of that country, and making a valuable collection of MSS. he returned to Vienna. He was afterwards employed at Buda, to make a library for Corvinus, king of Hungary, and in 1471, he settled at Nuremberg. In 1474 he went to Rome, to assist pope Sixtus IV. in the reformation of the calendar, and for his services, was named by him, archbishop of Ratibon, but died at Rome, 1476, of the plague, or, as some assert, by poison, administered by the sons of his enemy Trapezentius. As an astronomer and mathematician, in the dawning of that science, he was very respectable.

REGIS, Peter Sylvain, a French philosopher, born at Agenois, 1632. He studied at Cahors, under the jesuits; but the lectures of Rohault determined him to leave divinity for the study of philosophy. He went in 1665, to Toulouse, and there acquired great reputation as a lecturer on the new philosophy introduced by Des Cartes, and in 1670 he removed to Paris, where he was attended by such numerous audiences, that the followers of the old doctrines prevailed upon the archbishop of Paris to silence this bold and eloquent innovator. He was member of the academy of sciences, and died 1707. He wrote System of Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to. — Use of Reason and Faith, 4to. — an Answer to Huet's Censura Philosophiæ Cartesianæ, &c. These works, though once popular, and written with plausibility, have long since ceased to interest the public in consequence of the new lights thrown on the walks of philosophy.

REGIUS, Urban, or LE ROY, was born at Langenargen. He studied at Lindaw, Friburg, Basil, and Ingoldstadt, and distinguished himself so much by his literary talents, that he received from the hands of the emperor Maximilian, the poetical and oratorical crown. He was afterwards made professor of poetry and rhetoric; but being a convert to Luther's opinions, he went to settle at Augsburg, where he established a reformed church. He died suddenly at Zell, 1541. His works are contained in 3 vols. folio.

REGNARD, John Francis, next to Moliere, the best comic writer in France, was born at Paris, 1647. He early indulged his passion for travelling; but in passing from Italy to Marseilles, the ship in which he embarked was taken by pirates, and carried to Algiers. Now doomed to slavery, he gained the good graces of his master by his skill in making ragouts, and thus he became an useful man in the kitchen; but an amour brought on new difficulties and dangers. He was discovered, and had no choice, but either to turn Mahometan, or to be burnt alive. The French consul, however, extricated him from his situation, by ransom, and sent him back to his country. In 1681 he resumed his travels, and visited Flanders, Holland, and Sweden, and extended his excursion to Lapland, as far as the borders of the icy sea. He returned through Poland and Vienna, and after three years' absence, settled at Paris, and ardently devoted himself to the muses. He was made treasurer of France, and lieutenant of the waters and forests, and in the midst of independence, led the life of a voluptuary. He died at Dourdan, near Paris, it is said, of chagrin, 1709. His dramatic pieces have been published in 5 vols. 12mo.

REGNAULT, Noel, a learned jesuit, born at Arras. He wrote Philosophical Conversations, 3 vols. 12mo. — System of Logic, 12mo. — Origin of the Old and New Philosophy, 3 vols. — Mathematical Conversations, 3 vols. He died 1762, aged 79.

REGNIER, Mathurin, a French poet, born at Chartres, 1573. He was canon of Chartres, and held other benefices, besides a pension from Henry IV.; but though an ecclesiastic, he greatly disgraced himself by his debaucheries, and brought on premature old age. He was patronized by cardinal Joyeuse, and died at Rouen, 1613. He was the first French satirist, and in his own way, was equal to his able successor Boileau. Juvenal and Persius were his models, but he painted vice, sometimes in language offensive to modesty. Seventeen of his satires, and other poems, appeared at Rouen, 1614. The best edition is that of London, 1729, 4to. by Brossette, and that of Paris, 1746, 12mo.

REGNIER DES MARETS, Seraphin, a French writer, born at Paris, 1632. He went in 1662, as secretary to his patron, the duke de Crequi, ambassador to Rome, and in consequence of some elegant Italian sonnets, obtained a seat in the Crusca academy. In 1684 he became secretary to the French academy, in the room of Mezeray, and died 1713, prior of Grammont, and an abbot. He published a French Grammar — an Italian translation of Anacreon — Poems in French, Latin, Spanish, and Italian — History of the Disputes of France with the court of Rome, &c. besides a translation of Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice, finished at the age of 15. Voltaire says of him, that he did great service to the French language.

REGULUS, Marcus Atilius, a Roman general, who went to Africa to carry war against Carthage. His rapid successes were checked by the arrival of Xanthippus, and Regulus, defeated and taken prisoner, was sent by the Carthaginians to Rome to induce his countrymen to make peace. He dissuaded the Romans from accepting the offer, and on his return to Carthage, was cruelly put to death, B. C. 251.

REID, Thomas, an able Scotch divine, educated at Glasgow. He took his doctor's degree there, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy. He wrote Enquiry into the Human Mind — and essays on the In-Intellectual and Active Powers of Man, works of great merit, but very abstruse. He died 1796, aged 87. An account of his life has been given by Stewart.

REIHING, James, a native of Augsburg, who, after violently opposing the tenets of Luther, at last embraced them with unusual warmth, and obtained the chair of professor of theology at Tübingen. As he married, the catholics ascribed his conversion to his attachment to the female sex. He died 1628, aged 48. His works are all controversial.

REINBECK, John Gustavus, a protestant minister of the churches of Werder and Villeneuve, and afterwards of Cologne, and confessor to the queen and prince royal of Prussia. He was born at Zell, and died at Berlin 1741, aged 58. He was author of treatises on Redemption — on Marriage — Considerations on the Augsburg Confession — sermons in several vols. — metaphysical works, &c.

REINECCIUS, Reinier, professor of belles lettres at Frankfurt and Helmstadt, where he died 1595. He was a native of Steinheim, and wrote Methodus legendi Historiam, fol. — Historia Julia, 3 vols. fol. — Chronicon Hierosolymitanum, 4to. — Historia Orientalis, 4to.

REINER, Wenceslaus Laurence, a painter of Prague, whose landscapes and battles were finished in a very striking stile. He died 1743, aged 57.

REINESIUS, Thomas, a learned native of Gotha, in Thuringia, who studied medicine, and practised at Altenburg, where he became burgomaster. He was afterwards counsellor to the elector of Saxony, and then retired to Leipzig, where he died 1667, aged 80. He was also an elegant scholar, and philologist, and published besides medical treatises, Variorum Lectionum Libri tres, 4to. — Syntagma Inscriptionum Antiquarum, 2 vols. folio. — some letters and lectures, &c.

REINHOLD, Erasmus, an eminent astronomer, and mathematician, born at Salfeldt, Thuringia, 11th Oct. 1511. He studied and was also professor at Wittemberg, and died 19th Feb. 1553. He published an edition of Pinbadius' Theoriæ Planetarum — Ptolemy's Almagest, and other astronomical works. His son of the same name was also eminent as a mathematician and physician.

REISK, John, author of treatises on the Horns of Ammon — on the Oracles of the Sibyls — on the Ahasuerus of Esther — on Job's Malady — on the Images of J. C. — on Glossopetres, &c. was rector of the college of Wolfenbüttel, and died 1701, aged 60.

REISKE, John James, an eminent critic, born in the duchy of Anhalt, 1706. He studied at Leipzig, and by application surmounted the difficulties which arise from narrow fortune, and the want of powerful patrons. He afterwards went to Leyden, where he resided eight years, till the severity of his remarks on Burman's Petronius excited a cabal against him, which obliged him to return to Leipzig. In 1758, he was placed above independence by being appointed rector of the academy of Leipzig, and his classical reputation was increased by his marriage in 1764, with Ernestina Christina Muller, a lady of great talents, well versed in literature, and well qualified to assist and cheer his literary labors. He died 1774. He published Animadversiones in Auctores Græcos, 5 vols. a valuable work — an edition of the Greek Orators, 12 vols, 8vo. which were completed by his widow — Dionysius of Halicarnassus, 7 vols. — Plutarch's Works, in 9 vols. — Theocritus, &c.

RELAND, Hadrian, a learned orientalist, born at Ryp, North Holland, July 17th, 1676. He studied at Amsterdam, and made such progress in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, and in polite literature, there and at Utrecht, under Grævius and Leusden, that at the age of 22 he was offered a professorship at Linden, which, however, his father would not permit him to accept. In 1699 he accepted the professorship of philosophy at Harderwick, and two years after removed to the chair of oriental languages at Utrecht. This learned and amiable man died of the small-pox at Utrecht, 5th Feb. 1718. His chief works are Palæstina Monumentis vet. Illustrata, 2 vols. 4to. — Dissertationes on the Medals of the Antient Hebrews, 3 vols. 12mo. — Introduction to Hebrew Grammar — Antiquitates Sacræ Veterum Hebræorum — de Religione Mahomedicâ, 8vo. — de Spoliis Templi Hierosolymit. in arcu Titiano Romæ conspicuis — Epictetus, a new edition — Dissertationes Tredecim, on some curious subjects, &c. these works are all in elegant Latin. His brother Peter collected the Fast Consulares, 8vo.

REMBRANDT, Van Rein, a celebrated Flemish painter, son of a miller, born on the banks of the Rhine near Leyden, 1606. His education was so neglected that he scarce knew how to read, but nature supplied all the deficiencies of art, and gave him a genius with which he soared to fame, affluence, and immortality. His manner was intirely his own, and his knowledge of the chiaro obscuro was particularly correct. His chief aim was to imitate living nature, and he here succeeded to an admirable degree. He was singular in his conduct, he was fond of low company, and in his appearance was slovenly. He died at Amsterdam, 1668, or as some say 1678. When once told that his grounds were dark, he replied, that he was a painter, not a dyer. He engraved some pieces after his own designs, and with great judgment.

REMI or REMIGIUS, St. archbishop of Rheims, is known as the prelate who converted Clovis to christianity and baptized him. He died before 535. The letters published under his name are spurious. — Another, almoner to the emperor Lothaire, became archbishop of Lyons, 854. He presided at the council of Valentia, and was also present in other ecclesiastical synods. He died 875, author of a tract in support of St. Augustine's doctrine of predestination. — Another professor in the university of Paris, author of a commentary on the Psalms, &c. He died about 998.

REMI, Joseph Honoré, a native of Remiremont, who was advocate in the parliament of Paris. He lost his eye sight at the age of eight by the small-pox, but recovered it six years after. He acquired celebrity by his learning, and was author of Cosmopolisima — Days, a burlesque, in opposition to Young's Night Thoughts — la Code des François, 2 vols. 12mo. — Eloge on the chancellor de l'Hopital, a valuable work crowned crowned by the French academy, though censured by the Sorbonne — eulogies on Moliere, Colbert, Fenelon, besides several articles of jurisprudence in the New Encyclopaedia.

REMIGIO FLORENTINO, author of Reflections on the History of Guicciardini — of Italian poems — of translations of Corn. Nepos — of Ammianus Marcellinus, and of Fazello's History of Sicily, was a learned Dominican of Florence, who died 1580, aged 62.

RENAU D'ELISAGARAY, Bernard, a mathematician born at Bearn, of an ancient family. Under the protection of Colbert du Terron, of Seignelay, and of the count de Vermandois, he obtained distinction and was employed by Lewis XIV. in the improving of the construction of vessels, for which he was rewarded with a pension. He advised the bombarding of Algiers which succeeded against the opinion of other engineers, and afterwards he was very useful in conducting the sieges of Philippsburg, Manheim, &c. His services were honorably noticed, and he was made counsellor of marines, and grand cross of the order of St. Louis, and enjoyed the rank and privileges of a captain of the navy. This ingenious man died 30th Sep. 1719, aged 67. He wrote the Theory of the Management of Ships, 1689, 8vo. — Letters in Answer to the Objections of Huygens and Bernoulli against his Opinions and Theory.

RENAUDOT, Theophrastus, a physician, known as the first editor of Gazettes in France, 1631. He was born at Loudun, and died at Paris 1653, aged 70. He published besides an Abridgment of the Prince de Condé's Life, 4to. — Marshal Gassion's Life — Cardinal Michael Mazarine's Life, 4to. &c.

RENAUDOT, Eusebius, grandson of the preceding, was born at Paris 1646. He was educated by the jesuits, and acquired great knowledge of oriental literature. In 1700, he went with cardinal Noailles to Rome, and received from Clement XI. high marks of attention, and the priory of Fossay in Britany. He was also honorably received by the grand duke of Tuscany, and admitted member of the Crusca academy. Some of his learned dissertations are published in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member, as also of other learned societies. He died at Paris 1720, highly respected for his learning and piety. He prevented, says Voltaire, the publication of Bayle's dictionary in France. His works are, a Continuation of Nicole's Book on the Perpetuity of Faith, 2 vols. 4to. — Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum, Jacobitarum, &c. 4to. — Relations on the Indies and China, from the Arabic — Collection of Ancient Oriental Liturgies, 2 vols. 4to. — Athanasius' Life, from the Arabic, &c.

RENNELL, Thomas, a native of Chudleigh, Devon, who acquired some reputation as a limner. He was educated at Exeter, and after studying painting in London, he settled in his native county, and died at Dartmouth, 1788, aged 70. He also wrote some poetical pieces of considerable merit.

RESENIUS, Peter John, counsellor and professor of moral philosophy at Copenhagen, was born there 1625. He studied at Leyden, and afterwards travelled over France, Spain, and Italy, and was made counsellor at Padua. He was, on his return home, promoted to offices of trust and honor, and ennobled. He died 1688. He published Jus Aulicum Norvegicum, 4to. — an Icelandic Dictionary, 4to. — an edition of Edda Islandorum, Danice & Latine, 4to. — translated by Mallet in his introduction to the History of Denmark.

RESSIUS, Rutger, a learned Greek professor of Louvaine, highly commended by Erasmus. He was born near Liege, and died 1545. He edited the Aphorisms of Hippocrates — the Laws of Plato — Theophilus's Institutions of the Greek Law, 1536.

RESTAUT, Peter, a native of Beauvais, distinguished by his learning and integrity. He became advocate in the king's council, and died at Paris, universally respected, 14th Feb. 1764, aged 70. He published Principes Generaux et Raisonnés de la Grammaire Francoise, 12mo. a most valuable work, and other works.

RESTOUT, John, a native of Rouen, eminent as a painter. He became painter to the king, member and president of the academy of painting, and died 1768, aged 76. His best pieces are Alpheus saved in the arms of Diana, the triumph of Bacchus, painted for the king of Prussia, and the destruction of the palace of Armida. His son John Bernard became also known as a painter. He studied at Rome, and was member of the French academy of painting. He died 1797. His best pieces are Anacreon with a cup in his hand, Jupiter and Mercury entertained by Philemon and Baucis, &c.

RETZ, John Francis Paul de Gondy, cardinal de, Vic. GONDY.

REUCHLIN, John, a learned German, who greatly contributed to the revival of literature, born at Pforzheim 1455. He studied at Paris and Basil, and took the degree of doctor of law at Orleans, 1479. Both at Basil and at Orleans he acquired great reputation as a scholar, and as professor of Greek and Latin. He accompanied the count of Wirtemberg to Italy, and when he came to Rome he was persuaded by the learned of that place to alter his German name, which signifies Smoke, into the more dignified corresponding Greek word Capnion. He was afterwards sent by the court of Wirtemberg as ambassador to the emperor Frederic III. by whom he was honorably received; but after the death of his patron, he retired to Worms, till again employed in negotiations at Rome by the elector Palatine. He died at Ingoldstadt 1522, universally respected for his learning, and regarded as the first scholar who introduced the study of the Hebrew among modern christians. He wrote de Arte Cabalistica, folio, 1517, and the celebrated "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum," according to some authors.

REYET, Edvard, a writer in the reign of Charles II. author of "Town Shifts," a comedy of some merit, and said to have been written in a fortnight.

REVELEY, Willey, an English architect of merit, who studied under sir William Chambers. He was with with the Athenian Stuart in Greece, and edited his works on the antiquities and history of that country. The new church of Southampton is a specimen of his architectural skill. He died 1799.

REUVEN, Peter, a Dutch painter, who was employed in decorating the palace of Hoo in Holland, which he executed with great taste and elegance. He died 1718, aged 68.

REY, William, a native of Guillotiere near Lyons, eminent as a physician. He wrote Dissertations on Delirium — on the Plague — on a White Negro, &c. and died 10th Feb. 1756, aged 69.

REYHER, Samuel, a native of Schleusingen in Henneberg, professor of mathematics and jurisprudence at Kiel, and counsellor of state to the duke of Saxe Gotha. He wrote Mathesis Biblica — a Dissertation on the Inscription on the cross of J. C. and on the Hour of his Crucifixion — and translated Euclid into German. He died at Kiel, 22d Nov. 1714, aged 79.

REYLOF, Oliver, a native of Ghent, eminent as a Latin poet. He wrote Poematum Libri. 3. et Dissertationes de Piscibus — Opera Poetica, &c. and died 13th April, 1742, aged 72.

REYN, John de, a painter, born at Dunkirk. He studied under Vanduyke, and followed him into England, where his pieces procured him celebrity. He died 1650, aged 40.

REYNA, Cassiodorus, a Spaniard, who after great labor translated the bible into the Spanish language, 1569.

REYNEAU, Charles René, an eminent mathematician, born at Brissac in Anjou, 1650. He taught philosophy at Pezenas and Toulon, and in 1683, was promoted to the mathematical chair at Angers. He published Analysis démontrée, 2 vols. 4to. a popular work, in which he attempted to reduce to a body the theories of Newton, Descartes, Leibnitz, &c. He was member of the French academy, and distinguished himself further by the publication of "Science du Calcul des Grandsurs," 2 vols. 4to. and a tract on Logic, 12mo. He died 1728, universally esteemed.

REYNER, Edward, author of Precepts of Christian Practice — Vindication of Human Learning and Universities, was a native of Yorkshire, and educated and graduated at Cambridge. He settled at Lincoln 1627, but was ejected from his living for nonconformity at the restoration, and died soon after. His son John was born at Lincoln, and became fellow of Emanuel college, Cambridge. He took orders, but was deprived for nonconformity, after which he studied physic, and practised at Nottingham, where he died young. He wrote some things of considerable merit.

REYNOLDS, Edward, a native of Southampton, educated at Merton college, Oxford, and appointed rector of Braynton, Northamptonshire, and preacher of Lincoln's Inn. Though he favored the ruling party in the civil wars, and was a member of the Westminster assembly, and one of the presbyterian ministers at the Savoy conference, yet he became bishop of Norwich, to the great offence and indignation of his dissenting brethren. He died 1676, aged 81. He was in his opinions a strong Calvinist. His works, all on theological subjects, have appeared in one fol. vol.

REYNOLDS, sir Joshua, a celebrated painter, born 16th July, 1723, at Plympton, Devonshire, where his father, a clergyman, was master of the grammar school. He had very early a strong partiality for painting; but being intended for the church he was sent to Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts. Nothing, however, seemed to congenial to his taste as painting, and his father indulged him, and placed him in London under the care of Hudson, after which, about 1749, he travelled into Italy. Here he continued two years in company with Mr. afterwards lord Keppel, and after improving himself in the Italian school, and copying the best productions of Roman genius, he returned to England. His first production which attracted notice, was a portrait of his friend Keppel, and other pieces equally correct, and equally finished, continued to command the public attention, and to rank him among the greatest artists of the age. But though portrait painting was the fashion of the times, the young artist did not neglect historical subjects, but acquired from these more solid fame. On the establishment of the academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture, in 1769, none seemed more entitled to the honorable office of president than Reynolds and he accordingly was appointed, and received the dignity of knighthood on the occasion. But not only as a painter the name of Reynolds must stand respectable, but also as a literary character, and as the active promoter of the literary club, which was established in 1764, and which had among its illustrious members the names of Johnson, Burke, Garrick, Douglas, Goldsmith, the Wartons, Windham, &c. He furnished some valuable annotations to his friend Mason, when he published in 1782, a translation of Dufresnoy's Art of Painting, and he also contributed much to the illustrations of Shakespeare's text by his curious and original remarks. In the academic lectures which he delivered, sir Joshua displayed not only great taste and a perfect acquaintance with his profession, but strong powers of language, sound judgment, an elegant style and luminous order. His merits did not pass unrewarded; he was created doctor of laws by the universities of Dublin, and Oxford, and was honored with the friendship of the greatest men of the age at home and abroad. The last portrait which he painted was that of Mr. Fox, which displayed to the last period of life the strong powers of his genius and elegant taste. He resigned the chair of president of the Royal academy, and died 23d Feb. 1792, aged 69. His remains were deposited in St. Paul's cathedral, and while his obsequies were graced with the attendance of men of rank, of genius, and learning, the shops through the streets were shut up, so that the funeral of a private man engaged the attention of the public, and for a while suspended the busy concerns of the first commercial city in the world. As sir Joshua left no children, he bequeathed the best part of his property to his niece Miss Palmer, since married to lord Inchiquin, now marquis Thomond.

REYRAC, Francis Philip de Laurens de, canon of Chancelade, minister of St. Maclon of Orleans, and member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, was born at Longueville, Limousin, 1734, and died at Orleans 21st Dec. 1782, aged 49. He was not only a learned but an amiable character. He wrote an Hymn to the Sun, in poetic prose — Idylls also in prose — Sacred poems, 8vo. — Manuale Clericorum, &c.

REYS, Antony dos, author of Latin poems — Life of Ferdinand de Menaza, in Latin — Introduction to a Collection of Portuguese Poets — and an edition of a Corpus Illustrium Poetarum Lusitanorum qui Latine scripserunt, 7 vols. 4to. was a native of Peres, and died at Lisbon 1738, aged 48. He was chronologer of Portugal, and an ecclesiastic; but he refused to be raised to a bishopric, satisfied with retirement and privacy.

RHADAMISTUS, son of Pharamanes king of Iberia, married Zenobia the daughter of Mithridates, and was put to death A. D. 52.

RHAZIS, Mohammed Eben Zacharia Abubetrial, a learned Arabian physician, born at Rhei in Chorofana 852. He was the first after Serapion who introduced the medical art among his countrymen, and wrote various useful works, published folio 1548. His treatise on the Small Pox, was published by Dr. Mead, 8vo. 1767. He died about 935.

He was for some time corrector of the press to Frobenius at Basil, and thus became acquainted with Erasmus, whose life he wrote.

RHENFERD, James, a native of Mulheim, professor of oriental languages and divinity at Francker, died 1712, aged 58, author of various treatises of little merit.

RHESE, John David, a native of Anglesea, educated at Christ-church. He went in 1555 to Italy, and took there his degree of M. D. He was so conversant in the Italian language, that he was appointed moderator of the school of Pistoia. On his return home he practised physic at Brecknock, and died there 1609, aged 75. He wrote de Italica Linguae Pronunciatione — Cambro-Britannicae, Cymraecæve Linguae Institutiones, & Erudimenta, &c.

RHETICUS, George Joachim, a German astronomer, born at Faldkirk, Tyrol. He was mathematical professor at Wittenberg, and afterwards assisted the great Copernicus in his calculations. He was afterwards professor in Poland, and at Cassaria in Hungary, where he died 1576, aged 62. He published Narratio de Libris Revolutione Copernici, &c.

RHODIGINUS, Ludovicus Calius, author of Antiquæ Lectiones, Basil 1566, and other works, was born at Rovigo in the state of Venice, and died at Padua, where he taught the classics 1525, aged 75.

RHODIUS, John, author of notes on Scribonius Largus — Three Lectures on Medical Observations — and a treatise on Artificial Baths, was an eminent physician, born at Copenhagen. He died at Padua 1659, aged 72.

RHODIUS, Ambrose, professor of physic and mathematics at Anglo in Norway, was a native of Wittenberg. During the civil dissensions which prevailed in Norway he was seized and cruelly sent to prison, where he died 1633, aged 56. He was author of a treatise on the Transmigration of the Soul, and other works.

RHODOMAN, Laurentius, author of Historiæ Sacræ, 4to. — of a Latin Translation of Diodorus Siculus — of Quintus Calaber, &c. was born at Saffowerf, Upper Saxony, and died historical professor at Wittenberg 1606, aged 60.

RHOTENAMER, John, an eminent painter, born at Munich 1564. He fixed his residence at Venice, and studied the manner of Tintoret. His colors are very brilliant. His best piece was the banquet of the God and nymphs dancing. The time of his death is unknown.

RIADENEIRA, Peter, a Spanish jesuit of Toledo, elegant as a writer, but superstitious in the extreme. He studied at Paris and Padua, and was professor of rhetoric at Palermo. He died at Madrid 1611, aged 84. He was author of Lives of Saints, folio, 1616, of Ignatius Loyola, of Francis Borgia, of Lainez, and Salmeron, &c. — a treatise on the Schism of England — the Prince — the Library of the Jesuits, 8vo. &c.

RIBERA, Anastasius Pantaleon de, the Scarron of Spain, was born at Madrid, and became in consequence of his wit a great favorite at the court of Philip IV. His poems were all on ludicrous subjects, and appeared at Madrid 1648. A jesuit of that name died professor at Salamanca 1591. He wrote Commentaries on the Minor Prophets, fol. — on St. John's Gospel — the Epistle to the Hebrews — and the Apocalypse.

RICARD, John Marie, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who died 1678, aged 56. He wrote some things on his profession.

RICARD, Dominic, a native of Toulouse who settled at Paris, where he devoted himself to literature. Between 1783 and 1796, he translated the works of Plutarch in 17 vols. 12mo. in a manner elegant, correct, and faithful, and he wrote the Sphere, a poem, in eight cantos, with learned and curious notes. This benevolent ecclesiastic died at Paris, Jan. 1803, aged 63.

RICAUT or RYCAUT, sir Paul, an English writer, the 10th son of sir Peter Ricaut, knight. He travelled over Europe, Asia, and Africa, and in 1661, accompanied lord Winchelsea, the ambassador at the Ottoman court, as secretary, and while there he wrote "the Present State of the Ottoman Porte in three books," printed 1670, folio. He was afterwards consul at Smyrna for 11 years, and during his residence there wrote the State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, published 1679. In 1685, he went with lord Clarendon, the viceroy of Ireland, as secretary for the provinces of Leinster and Connaught, and he was, in 1688, knighted by James II. and made judge of the Irish court of admiralty. He went afterwards as resident for king William in the Hanse towns, and after 10 years' absence returned to England in 1700, and died that same year. He wrote besides a Continuation of Knolles' History of the Turks, fol. — a Continuation of Platina's Lives of the Popes, fol. — Vega's Commentaries of Peru translated, fol. — the Spanish Critic, 8vo.

RICCATI, Vincent, a jesuit, born at Castel Franco in the Trevisa. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna till the suppression of his order, after which he retired to his native town, where he died 1775, aged 68. He wrote some mathematical works, the best known of which is his treatise on the Integral Calculus, 3 vols. 4to. &c.

RICCI, Matthew, a jesuit, born at Macerata, 1552. He

He went to India, and after finishing his studies at Goa, he was sent as missionary to China. With difficulty he reached Peking, where his mathematical knowledge recommended him to the notice of the emperor, for whom he formed a geographical map, in which out of flattery he placed China in the middle of the earth. He conducted himself with such address that he obtained leave to build a church at Peking. He died there 1610, aged 58. He wrote Lettres Edifiantes — Memoirs of China, &c.

Ricci, Michael Angelo, a cardinal, born at Rome. He was an able mathematician, and was patronized by Innocent II. who raised him to the purple 1681. His treatise de Maximis & Minimis, is a valuable performance. He died 21st May, 1682, aged 63.

Ricci, Lawrence, a native of Florence, of illustrious birth. He embraced the order of the jesuits, which was suppressed while he was general. He was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo by pope Clement XIV. and obliged to write a circular letter to his order to announce their final suppression. He died in his confinement, 24th Nov. 1775, aged 72. He wrote a memoir which appeared after his death, in which he protested against the violence offered to the jesuits, and declared that they had committed nothing which deserved such harsh treatment.

Ricci, Sebastian, an Italian painter, born at Belluno near Venice. He distinguished himself greatly by his pieces, and was received with much applause in Germany, France, and England. He died at Venice 1734. His nephew Mark was eminent also as a landscape and historical painter, and died 1730.

Riccio, Dominico, an eminent painter, born at Verona. The gathering of the Manna forms the subject of one of his admired pieces in the church of Verona. He died 1517, aged 23.

Riccioli, John Baptista, an Italian astronomer, born at Ferrara, and educated among the jesuits, of whose society he became a member. He taught rhetoric, philosophy, &c. at Parma and Bononia, but chiefly devoted himself to mathematics and astronomy, and died 1671, aged 73. His best known works are, Geographiæ and Hydrographiæ, lib. 12. 1672 — Chronologia Reformata, fol. — Astronomia Vetus, 2 vols. fol. — Astronomia Reformata, fol.

Riccoboni, Lewis, a native of Modena, who distinguished himself on the Italian theatre, and in 1716, came to France with his wife and his son, where he acquired equal celebrity. He abandoned the stage in 1729, in consequence of religious scruples, and died 1753, aged 79. He wrote several comedies, some of which were received with great applause, Thoughts on Declamation — Discourse on the Reformation of the Theatre, 12mo. — Observations on Comedy, and on Moliere's Genius — History of the Italian Theatre, 8vo. — Reflections on the Theatres of Europe, 8vo. His second wife Mary Laboras de Mezieres was a native of Paris, who acquired reputation as an actress in the Italian theatre, which she quitted 1761. She was a woman of great sensibility, elegant taste, and vast information. She wrote several romances, which possess merit, besides letters and other miscellanies. She died in great distress 6th Dec. 1792, aged 68. His son Antony Francis, by his first wife was born at Mantua. He was on the stage in the Italian theatre at Paris, from 1726 to 1750, and played with success. He wrote some pieces, some of which are still in MS. but his Art du Theatre in 8vo. 1750, possesses great merit, and is still read with satisfaction. He died 15th May, 1772, aged 65.

RICHARD I. king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, succeeded his father Henry II. 1189. The beginning of his reign was disgraced by the massacre of the Jews, and by the plunder of their property, not only in London, where their appearance at the coronation had excited the indignation of the populace, but at York and other places. In 1190, Richard instead of establishing order and tranquillity in his dominions, set sail with Philip Augustus of France for the Holy Land. Though, however, dissension between these monarchs partly defeated the purpose of the enterprise, and caused the return of Philip to France, Richard led his army against the infidels, defeated Saladin in a battle at Cæsarea, and then concluding a truce with him, embarked for Europe. In his return he was shipwrecked on the Venetian shores, and as he passed in disguise through Germany, he was seized by Leopold duke of Austria, and delivered to the emperor Henry VI. and cruelly doomed to the horrors of captivity. His retreat was discovered by the fidelity of his friend Blondel, and by the eager loyalty of his subjects, and for a large ransom he was restored to liberty and landed at Sandwich 1194. To give greater dignity to his return, he was crowned a second time, and soon after marched against Philip Augustus, who had not only excited John against his absent brother, but had seized part of his continental dominions in Normandy. Though a peace was made in 1196, Richard three years after renewed the war, and while besieging Chalus in the Limousin, he received a mortal wound from an arrow. He died 6th April, 1199, aged 42. Though he pardoned the man who had shot him, his generals after his death ordered the unhappy wretch to be fled alive. Though brave, Richard was haughty and avaricious, and it was said of him that he would have sold even London, if he could have found a purchaser.

RICHARD II. son of Edward prince of Wales, succeeded his grand-father Edward III. on the English throne 1377. The severity of some taxes imposed by the parliament, raised discontent among the people, and an armed multitude, headed by Wat Tyler, appeared in Smithfield in defiance of the government. Richard, though but 15, boldly rode up to meet the insurgents, and when the lord mayor, Walworth, who attended him, had with the blow of his mace struck dead the chief of the rebels, the young king called out to the multitude, who prepared by acts of violence to avenge the death of their leader, "what my lieges will you kill your king, follow me I will be your leader." The appeal was successful, and the people returned to their duty; but though their grievances were redressed after the punishment of a few violent leaders, still by degrees acts of oppression were permitted to prevail. Afterwards Richard made war against France and Scotland, but his administration revolted some of the nobles, and at last Henry duke of Lancaster, his cousin, offended with the tyranny of his conduct, took up arms against against him. The king, abandoned by his subjects, threw himself on the mercy of his victorious enemy, and begged only for life and a pension. He was afterwards deposed by the parliament, and on the breaking out of an insurrection in his favor, eight murderers entered his apartments at Pontefract castle, determined to take away his life. The unhappy man wrested a battle axe from one of the assassins, and after laying four dead at his feet, perished by the repeated blows of the others, 1400.

RICHARD III. duke of Gloucester, and brother of Edward IV. was a monster of iniquity. He caused his infant nephews Edward V. and Richard duke of York to be murdered in the Tower, and then procured his own nomination to the crown 1483. Soon after he had to defend himself against Buckingham, who had supported him in his crimes; but he triumphed and beheaded his enemy. He was less fortunate against Henry earl of Richmond, who had invaded the kingdom. The rival armies met in Bosworth field, and after performing prodigies of valor, Richard fell, covered with wounds, and left his victorious antagonist in possession of the throne, 22d Aug. 1485. This worthless monarch was said to have been deformed from his birth, but some modern historians deny the fact. Though a tyrant and a hypocrite he possessed great courage, and for firmness of mind had few equals.

RICHARD I. surnamed the Fearless, succeeded his father William as duke of Normandy 942. His territories were invaded by Louis IV. of France, and by Otho of Germany; but his rights were defended by the valor of his subjects, and the aid of the king of Denmark and the count of Paris. He died at Fecamp 996, aged 64.

RICHARD II. surnamed the Good, succeeded his father Richard I. as duke of Normandy. He was much engaged in war with his neighbours, and died 1027.

RICHARD, Thomas, a Benedictine monk in the abbey of Tavistock, who translated into English verse the five books of Boethius' Consolations of Philosophy. This work was printed in Tavistock abbey 1525.

RICHARD, Martin, a native of Antwerp, born with only a left arm. Though thus helpless by nature, he became a painter of eminence, and produced pieces which merited the high praises of Vandyke. He died 1636, aged 45. His brother David, though an inferior artist possessed merit as a painter.

RICHARD DE ST. VICTOR, a Scotchman, who was prior of St. Victor's monastery at Paris, where he died 1173. He wrote several tracts on Theology, collected together in 2 vols. fol. Rouen, 1650.

RICHARD, N. a native of Dundalk in Ireland, who studied at Oxford, and became archbishop of Armagh 1347. He died universally respected 1359. He wrote sermons, besides tracts, &c.

RICHARD, John, an ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He died there 1586, aged 65. He wrote some theological works, &c.

RICHARD, René, a French ecclesiastic, of the congregation of the oratory. He died 21st Aug. 1727, aged 73, dean of St. Opportune, at Paris. He wrote a Parallel between Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin — Christian Maxims, &c.

RICHARD, Charles Louis, a Benedictine, born at Blainville, in Lorraine, 1711. He wrote sermons, 4 vols. — Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Knowledge, 16 vols. fol. — Analysis of General Councils, 5 vols. 4to. &c. and died at the close of the 18th century.

RICHARDS, Nathaniel, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree 1634. His poems, sacred and satirical, including Messalina a tragedy, &c. appeared 1645.

RICHARDSON, John, a native of Cheshire, educated at Oxford, and afterwards incorporated at Dublin. He became bishop of Ardagh, in Ireland; but left the country during the rebellion, and came to London. He died 1654. He is author of Observations on Ezekiel, &c. fol.

RICHARDSON, Jonathan, an English portrait painter, born about 1665. He was originally apprenticed to a scrivener, but afterwards became the pupil of Riley, whose niece he married. He acquired reputation and independence, though some speak of the merits of his pencil with indifference, and died May 28th, 1745. He published in 1719, an Essay on the Whole Art of Criticism, as it relates to painting, and an account of some statues, bas-reliefs, &c. in which he was assisted by his son. These united labors afterwards produced notes and remarks on Milton's Paradise Lost. As the father had observed, that in classical literature, he had looked at it through his son, the sportive pencil of Hogarth represented him as peeping at a Virgil on a shelf, through a telescope, with which his son was persecuted.

RICHARDSON, Joseph, a native of Hexham, Northumberland, who entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, in 1774, and afterwards studied the law at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. He wrote Criticisms on the Rolliad, and Probationary Odes for the Laureatship, in which he censured with broad satire, the great public characters of the times — the Fugitive, a comedy, performed with some applause, &c. He was for some time in parliament, on the interest of the duke of Northumberland; but did not distinguish himself as an orator either at the bar, or in the house of Commons. He died 1803.

RICHARDSON, Samuel, an eminent novel writer, son of a farmer in Derbyshire, and born 1689. His education was very confined; but though he imbibed in his youth, no knowledge of the learned languages, his natural good sense and reflection supplied all deficiencies of art. In 1706 he was bound apprentice to Mr. Wilde, of Stationers' hall, and afterwards he worked as compositor, and corrector of the press, till, on taking his freedom, he hired a house in one of the courts of Fleet street, from which he removed to Salisbury square. He was in 1723, engaged with the duke of Wharton, in the publication of the True Briton; but as the work was violently severe against the government, he stopped at the sixth number. He next was concerned with the Daily Journal, and afterwards with the Daily Gazetteer, and at last, by the friendship of Onslow, the speaker, he obtained the lucrative office of printer of the journals of the house of commons. In 1754 he was elected master of the company of Stationers, and in 1760 he purchased a moiety of the patent of law printer to the king, which he conducted with Miss Lintot, afterwards the wife of sir H. Fletcher.

Fletcher. In 1740 he appeared before the public as the author of Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded, a novel, which was universally read, and universally approved; and afterwards he produced Clarissa Harlowe, and then Sir Charles Grandison. Of these two last performances the former is regarded by the generality of critics, as superior to the other; but in all his works the author has presented to his reader a most interesting and accurate picture of human nature. His wish was to benefit mankind, and with all the treasures of a benevolent heart, he drew scenes which gave virtue the noblest of her attractions, and vice, the most horrid and disgusting of its deformities. These works were particularly popular, and the author was every where regarded as a man of the most virtuous sentiments, of the most amiable modesty, and possessed of the most dignified powers of the imagination. By the creative faculties of his mind, Richardson thus raised himself to celebrity and opulence; but his elevation was still adorned by all the humble virtues which rejoice in the opportunity of doing good, and of disseminating blessings wherever human nature is capable of improvement. Richardson generally retired from his town house on the Saturday, to his villa at North End, Hammer-smith, and afterwards to Parsons' Green, where he resided till the Monday, and was visited by persons of rank, literary fame, and splendid talents. Sedulous in business, he acquired property and independence; but in the midst of the consequence of wealth, and the flattery of admiring friends, he was the kind master, and the hospitable friend, and never forgot to add exemplary conduct to religious appearances, and sincere devotion to pious exhortations. This worthy and amiable man, who was honored with the friendship, or favorable good opinion of every person of talents, of virtue, and of rank, in his time, was afflicted in the last part of life with a paralytic disorder, which proved fatal, 4th July, 1761, in his 72d year. He was buried by the side of his first wife, in St. Bride's church. He was twice married; by his first wife, daughter of Mr. Wilde, printer, he had five sons and one daughter, who all died young, and by the second, who survived him, daughter of Mr. Leake, bookseller of Bath, he had a son and five daughters, of whom only four daughters survived him. Besides his excellent novels, he published a volume of familiar letters, for the use of young people — Æsop's Fables, with reflections — a paper, No. 97, in the Rambler — Negotiation of Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador to the Porte, &c. A well written account of his life has appeared in 1804, by Mrs. Barbauld, prefixed to an edition of his Correspondence with Eminent Persons, a publication which, while it sets the character of Richardson in an amiable light, shews that his correspondents sought to gain his good opinion by the incense of flattery, of praise, and adulation.

RICHELET, Cesar Peter, a French writer, born at Cheminon, in Champagne. He was the author of an useful dictionary of the French language, full, however, of satirical reflections and obscenities, in 4to. Geneva, afterwards enlarged to 2 vols. fol. 1721, Lyons, and again, 3 vols. fol. Lyons, 1755. He also translated Vega's Conquest of Florida, and wrote a Dictionary of Rhimes, and other critical works. He died 1698.

RICHELIEU, Armand du Pleffis de, a celebrated statesman in France, born of noble parentage at the castle of Richelieu, 5th Sept. 1585. He studied at the Sorbonne, and at Rome, and in 1607 was made bishop of Lucon. On his return to Paris, he became the favorite of Mary de Medicis, to whom he was appointed almoner, and he soon was made secretary of state. The death of marshal d'Ancre, however, his friend and protector, checked his ambition, and he retired with the queen mother to Blois; but soon again to be restored to favor. By intrigue he effected a reconciliation between the queen and her son Lewis XIII. and in 1624 he was placed in the difficult office of prime minister of France, and afterwards of superintendant of navigation and commerce. Naturally bold, and fond of war, the new minister, who had been raised to the dignity of cardinal, determined to reduce Rochelle, whose protection of the protestants was offensive to the nation, and whose independence and naval power seemed a disgrace to the greatness of France. After a vigorous siege, during a year, Rochelle opened her gates to the conqueror, 28th Oct. 1628, and proud of his conquest, the minister advanced to the subjugation of the protestants in other parts of the kingdom. He next attacked Savoy, and after taking Pignerol and Casal, he returned to Paris, to conquer the intrigues of his enemies, and to restore himself to the undisputed favor of the king. By his power, Gaston, the king's brother, was banished, and Mary de Medicis, the queen, to whom he owed his elevation, was sent to end her life in melancholy exile at Cologne, and while all France was submissively obedient to his nod, the neighbouring kingdoms were, by his intrigues, torn by dissensions, secretly agitated by fears, or openly threatened by insurrections. Yet while engaged in establishing his own power, he did not forget to consolidate the prosperity of the people; and while he persecuted, and cruelly punished his enemies and his rivals, he did not neglect the glory of France. He erected the French academy, rebuilt the Sorbonne, founded the royal printing house, and established the botanical garden, with a munificence worthy not merely the minister, but the monarch of a great kingdom. He was liberal in his patronage to men of letters; but as he had a poetical turn, he was unfortunately jealous of the celebrity of the Cid of Corneille, and employed some of the literary hirelings of the court to depreciate the merits of the immortal bard. He died 4th Dec. 1642, aged 58. In his character Richelieu united all the abilities, and the ambition of a great man, but little of the virtues of a good man; and while he patronized the arts and sciences, and extended protection to literature and industry, it might proceed not from the motives of a generous mind, but the ostentatious wish of being surrounded by men whose works and gratitude can confer immortality. Besides the dignity of cardinal, conferred on him by Gregory XV. he was created duke and peer of France, and enjoyed all the favors which the partiality of the king, and the adulation of the nation could bestow on him. He wrote Political Testament, 2 vols. 8vo. — Methods of Controversies concerning Points of Faith — Defence of the Catholic Faith — Christian Instruction — Perfection of a Christian — a Curious Journal — letters, relations, &c. His life has been written by J. Le Clerc, 5 vols. 12mo. 1753.

RICHER,

RICHER, Edmund, a native of Chaource, in Langres. He possessed great powers of mind, and a lively imagination, and he embraced with unusual ardor, the party of the League, whose conduct he ably defended with his pen. He took his degrees in theology at Paris, and in 1611, wrote against the Dominicans, and asserted the superiority of general councils over the pope. This drew upon him the censures of the pope's legate, though he was defended by the parliament of Paris, and at last he was dismissed from the office of syndic in the university, and afterwards imprisoned, and obliged by the virulence of his enemies, to make a public recantation of his opinions. These proceedings injured his constitution, and hastened his death, which happened 28th Nov. 1631, aged 72. His other works are Vindiciæ Doctrinæ Majorum de Auctoritate Ecclesiæ in Rebus Fidei & Morum, 4to. — de Potestate Ecclesiæ in Rebus Temporalibus, 4to. — History of General Councils, 3 vols. 4to. — Obstetrix Animorum, 4to. &c.

RICHER, John, a bookseller of Paris, who died 1665. He is known as the first compiler of the Mercurie Francois.

RICHER, Henry, a native of Longueil, in Caux. He was intended for the law; but he preferred literature, and settled at Paris, where he died 12th March, 1748, aged 63. He translated into verse Virgil's Eclogues — a Collection of Fables — Life of Mæcenas, with notes — Sabinus and Coriolanus, two tragedies.

RICHER D'AUBE, Francis, a native of Rouen, author of an Essay on the Principles of Right and Morals, 4to. He died at Paris, Oct. 1752, aged 63.

RICHER, N. a French philosopher, who first observed the shortening of the pendulum, while at Cayenne, 1672. This singular discovery, in the hands of Newton and Huygens, led to the most astonishing truths.

RICIMER, a Roman patrician, who acquired such power as a general, that he put down the emperors, and introduced revolutions into the state, as he pleased. He put to death Majorian, and raised to the throne in his room, Libius Severus, 461, and he afterwards bravely repelled the Vandals of Africa, who attacked the dominions of his master. After the death of Severus, Anthemius was made emperor, and Ricimer married his daughter, but soon after dethroned him.

RICIUS, Paul, a converted Jew, professor of philosophy at Pavia. He was afterwards physician to the emperor Maximilian, and was highly esteemed by Erasmus, and other learned men. He had a controversy with Eccius, and supported that the celestial bodies are animated. His works are, De Cœlesti Agricultura, fol. — Talmudica Commentariola, 4to. — De LXXIII Mosaicæ Sanctionis Edictis, 4to.

RICOBONI, Antony, a learned native of Rovigo. He was professor of eloquence at Padua, and died there, 1599, aged 58. He wrote in elegant Latin, Historical Commentaries — treatise on Rhetoric, 8vo. History of Padua university — Commentaries on Aristotle's and Cicero's Works, &c.

RIDER, William, author of a History of England — a Commentary on the Bible — and other popular works, was lecturer of St. Vedast, Foster lane, and for several years under-master of St. Paul's school. He died 1785.

RIDGELY, Thomas, a dissenting divine, born in London, 1670. He was for several years minister of a congregation near Black-friars, and afterwards kept an academy, near Aldermanbury. He died in Moorfields, 1737. He wrote a Commentary on the Assembly's larger Catechism, 2 vols. folio.

RIDLEY, Nicolas, an eminent bishop and martyr, born of an ancient family in Tynedale, Northumberland, 1500. He was educated at Newcastle upon Tyne, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. His abilities were such that he was invited to University college, Oxford, but declined the liberal offer, and went for three years to travel on the continent. On his return to Cambridge, he distinguished himself by his application, and by his zeal in favor of the reformation. By the friendship of his patron Crammer, he obtained the vicarage of Herne in Kent, and afterwards was chosen master of Pembroke hall, and nominated chaplain to the king. During the royal visitation in the north of the kingdom, he attended the visitors and preached to the people, and explained with eloquence and ability the true principles of religion. In 1547, he was appointed bishop of Rochester, and three years after, on Bonner's expulsion from the see of London, he was placed in his room, where he behaved with tenderness and affectionate attention to the mother and relatives of his predecessor. He was very instrumental in settling the articles of religion, the liturgy, and the homilies, and by his influence with the king, he procured the establishment of those noble foundations, Christ's hospital, St. Thomas', Southwark, St. Bartholomew's, and Bridewell. The share which he bore in the labors of the reformation, marked him as an object of hatred under Mary, and particularly the zeal with which he embraced the cause of the unfortunate Jane Grey. He was ordered to dispute on theological subjects at Oxford with some popish bishops; and when he refused to recant the principles which he had advanced, he was cruelly sentenced to the stake. He suffered this unhuman treatment with great resignation, and was burnt near the corner of Baliol college, with his friend the venerable Latimer, 1555. He was author of a treatise against transubstantiation, and some of his letters and sermons were afterwards published. An interesting account of his life and labors was published by his descendant Glossiter Ridley.

RIDLEY, Thomas, a native of Ely, of the same family as the preceding. He received his education at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and then applied himself to the study of the civil law. His abilities recommended him to the court; he was knighted, made master in chancery, and afterwards vicar general to the archbishop of Canterbury. He was author of a View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law, and died 1626.

RIDLEY, Glossiter, an eminent divine, born at sea in 1702, in the Glossiter Indiaman, from which circumstance he received his christian name. He was educated at Winchester school, and became fellow of New college, Oxford, where he took the degree of B. C. L. 1729. He had a great partiality for the stage stage in his younger years, and wrote, with some friends, a tragedy, in four acts, and to this partiality may be attributed the eloquence and graceful delivery which he displayed in the pulpit. He obtained the living of Westow, Norfolk, and the donative of Poplar in Middlesex; and after some years spent in the peaceful obscurity of a country curacy, he was at last, in 1768, in consequence of his able labors, presented to a golden prebend in Salisbury, by archbishop Secker, who also conferred on him the degree of LL. D. He died 3d Nov. 1774, and had his virtues recorded in an epitaph by the learned Dr. Lowth. He left a widow and four daughters. He had lost two sons early; one, Thomas, by the small-pox at Madras, and James, the other, when he began to distinguish himself as an author. He published the Life of bishop Ridley, from whom he was descended — Sermons at lady Moyer's Lectures — Melampus, a poem — two tragedies, never printed — Review of Philips's Life of cardinal Pole — Psyche, a poem, &c. — His son James was author of the Tales of the Genii, 2 vols. a book much admired — James Lovegrove, a novel, &c. He was minister of Romford, Essex, and had been educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford.

RIDOLFI, Claudio, a painter of Verona; whose historical pieces and portraits were much admired. He died 1644, aged 84.

RIDPATH, George, a native of Stirlingshire, educated at Edinburgh. For his attachment to protestantism, and for boldly opposing the second James in his religious innovations, he fled from Scotland; but afterwards returned at the revolution, and was one of the clerks of session. He died 1717, aged 54. He translated Craig's Scotland's Sovereignty.

RIEDELSE, John Herman, baron de, a learned German, author of Travels in Greece. He was in the service of the Prussian court, and resided as ambassador at Vienna, where he died 1785, aged 45.

RIEGELS, M. a native of Denmark, who published a valuable history of his country. He was governor of the king's pages at Copenhagen, and died 1802, aged 74.

RIELEY, Henry, author of the "Anatomy of the Brain, &c." published 1695, was fellow of the college of physicians.

RIENZI, Nicolas Gabrini de, a remarkable character in the 14th century, who, though but the son of a miller, or a common vintner at Rome, raised himself to the sovereign power. By education and labor he polished and improved a mind naturally strong, fervent, and ambitious, and in reading the historians of ancient Rome, he flattered himself that he should one day restore the glories and the liberties of his country. By his assiduity and demeanour he became so popular, that he was one of the deputies sent to Avignon to solicit pope Clement VI. to come and fix his residence at Rome; and though the embassy did not succeed, Rienzi had the satisfaction of gaining the pontiff's favor and protection. He returned to Rome as apostolic notary, and by degrees gained to his party the common people of Rome, and many of the nobles. Inveighing with bitterness against the debaucheries of the great, and painting in the most striking colors, the ancient glories and the present decay of Rome, he persuaded his friends and followers that he was able to restore their country to its former dignity. Surrounded by those who were necessary to his views, he ascended the capitol, and after haranguing the people with the permission of the papal vicar, he raised up the ensigns of liberty, and promised to the Romans that he would reward their obedience to the laws by the grandeur and the powerful influence of their forefathers. Declared sovereign of Rome, he had the address to obtain the pope's approbation to his measures, and to conciliate his protection; but though he for a while commanded the respect of the Romans, envy attended him, and enemies arose determined to effect his downfall. While he reprobated the conduct of the nobles, he himself was guilty of excesses, and the obscure plebeian, raised to sovereignty, not only feasted with all the luxury of the monarch, but acted frequently in a capricious and oppressive manner. After enjoying absolute power for six months, under the title of tribune of Rome, he was forced to fly by the nobles, and being seized by his enemies, was sent to the pope at Avignon, and thrown into a dungeon. Innocent VI. the successor of Clement, knew, however, the influence of his prisoner, and he drew him from his confinement, where he had pined away three years, and sent him to Rome with the title of governor and senator, hoping that by his gratitude he might defeat the schemes and insurrections of those petty tyrants who harassed and distracted the state. Rienzi again raised himself, over the opposition of his enemies, to power; but success again made him violent and resentful, and four months after his second elevation, during a tumult excited by some conspirators, a dagger was aimed at his heart, which deprived him of life, 8th Oct. 1354. Such was the tragical end of this ambitious demagogue, who, by his abilities, for a while restored plenty, justice, and liberty to the degenerate Romans, and not only filled all Europe with the fame of his wisdom and exploits, but commanded the respect and submission of foreign potentates. Petrarch, who witnessed his elevation, speaks with raptures of his conduct, and recalling to mind the splendid achievements of Rome, compares him to the immortal Brutus.

RIGALTIVS, Nicolas, an ingenious Frenchman, born at Paris, 1577. He was brought up by the jésuits, and applied himself to the law, which, however, he soon relinquished for polite literature. He soon recommended himself to the notice of the learned, particularly Thuanus, and he was appointed king's librarian after the departure of Isaac Casaubon to reside in England. He was also made by the king procureur-general of the court of Nancy, and counsellor of the parliament of Metz. He died 1654. His works are, excellent editions of Cyprian, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix, with valuable notes — Continuation of Thuanus' History — de Verbis in Novellis Constitutionibus post Justinianum Glossarium, 4to. Diatriba de Juvenalis Satira — Fanus Paralyticum — Auctores Finium Regundorum — de Modo Fœnori Proposito, &c.

RIGAUD,

RIGAUD, Hyacinth, a painter, born at Perpignan, 1663, and called for his excellence the French Vandike. He was ennobled by his countrymen, and also by Lewis XV. and made director of the academy of painting. His draperies were much admired. He died 1743.

RILEY, John, a London painter, who after the death of sir Peter Lely, acquired high reputation and much opulence for his portraits. He died 1691, aged 45.

RIMINALDI, Orazio, a native of Pisa, eminent as an historical painter. He died 1638, aged 40.

RINCON, Antonio del, a Spanish painter, born at Guadalaxara. His pieces are much admired in Spain. He died 1500.

RINUCCINI, Ottavio, an Italian poet, born at Florence. He went to France in the retinue of Mary de Medicis, and was said to be the inventor of the opera, which, however, some attribute to Emilio del Cavahero of Rome. His poetry as well as his operas are highly and deservedly admired. He died 1621, at Florence, where his works were published.

RIOLAN, John, a physician at Paris, born at Amiens. He defended the doctrine of Hippocrates against the modern chemists, and wrote various works on anatomy and medicine, printed together, Paris, 1610, folio. He was a man of great erudition, and died 18th Oct. 1605. His son John was also a physician of eminence, and professor of anatomy and botany. He wrote Comparatio Veteris Medicinæ cum Novâ, 12mo. — Schola Anatomica, 8vo. reprinted in folio with additions — Gigantomachia, 8vo. in consequence of the pretended discovery of the skeleton of a giant — Gigantologia, 8vo.

RIPLEY, George, an English mathematician, canon of Bridlington, Yorkshire, and author of Compound of Alchymy, &c. — Aurum Potabile, or the Universal Medicine. He died 1490.

RAPPERDA, John William, baron de, a native of Groningen, of illustrious family, who, after serving the States General as colonel of infantry, was sent as ambassador to Spain. His conduct was so pleasing to Philip V. that he settled at Madrid, and was employed on affairs of importance, and was created a duke and peer of the kingdom, and entrusted with the departments of marine, war, and finance. These offices were too high for his abilities, and he was disgraced, and afterwards sent to the prison of Segovia; but he escaped to Portugal, and after passing through England, he landed in Holland, where he was persuaded by the ambassador of Morocco to go and settle in Africa. At Morocco he became a great favorite with the emperor, and professed the religion of Mahomet. To render himself still more popular, and to acquire authority, he pretended to establish a religion which embraced all the tenets of the Christian, Judaic, and Mahometan doctrines; but these measures at last created him enemies, and he fled from Morocco to Tetuan, where he died Nov. 1747. His two sons were drowned in coming from Spain to England.

RISBECK, Gaspard, a German writer, born near Mayence. An ardent imagination and the love of independence hurried him into extravagance, and at last, while he despised all political and civil employments, he found himself poor and without resources. He then entered into the service of a bookseller, and afterwards travelled, and then settled at Zurich, and next at Arau, where he died 3d Feb. 1786, aged 36, a victim to melancholy and affected misanthropy. He wrote Travels through Germany — and an History of Germany.

RISDON, Trifram, author of an History of Devonshire, which has been published in a mutilated form, 1714, 2 vols. 8vo. was a native of Wincot, Devon, and was educated at Oxford. He died at Wincot, 1640, aged 60. The topographical part of his history was edited separately, 1735, 4to.

RISLEY, Thomas, a puritan divine. He was born near Warrington, Lancashire, and became fellow of Pembroke college, Oxford; but in 1662 he was ejected for non-conformity. He then became preacher to a dissenting congregation, and died 1716, aged 86. He wrote a treatise on Family Religion, 8vo. &c.

RITSON, Joseph, a native of Stockton on Tees, who became a conveyancer in Gray's inn, and afterwards purchased the office of high bailiff of the Savoy in 1785. He studied antiquities, and published Observations on Shakespeare's editions by Johnson and Stevens — Criticisms on Malone's edition — Descent of the English Crown — Observations on Warton's History of English Poetry — English Anthology — Collection of English Songs, 3 vols. — and of Scotch Songs, 2 vols. — Bibliographia Poetica — Metrical Romances, 3 vols. — treatise on Abstinence from Animal Food, &c. Though a man of learning and information, he adopted a most singular and capricious form of orthography, and in his temper was violent and overbearing. He died 1803, aged 51.

RITTENHOUSE, David, a native of Philadelphia, who, from a clock-maker, became an eminent astronomer. He pursued his astronomical studies while engaged in the business of his farm; but was so respectable a philosopher, that he succeeded Franklin as president of the American philosophical society. He made observations on the transit of Venus over the sun's disc in 1769, with great accuracy, at the request of the American philosophers, and deserved the esteem of the learned of both continents. He died 1796, aged 64. Several of his communications appear in the American transactions.

RITTERSHUSIUS, Conradus, a learned civilian, born at Brunswick, Sept. 25th, 1560. He studied at Helmstadt, and afterwards became professor of law at Altorf, where he continued to reside till his death, 1613, though he had the most liberal invitations from German and Dutch universities. He edited Oppian's Cynegeticon, and some other works. His son George wrote the Life of his Father, and his son Nicolas was afterwards professor of law at Altorf, and published Genealogiæ Imperatorum, Regum, Ducum, Comitum, &c. 7 vols. folio. He died 1670.

RIVALZ, Anthony, a native of Toulouse. He studied painting under his father, and afterwards improved himself at Rome, and obtained a prize from St. Luke's academy. His portraits and historical pieces pieces were much admired. He died 1735, aged 68.

RIVARD, Francis, a native of Neufchateau in Lorraine, eminently known as a mathematical professor at Beauvais. He published several valuable treatises on geometry, &c. and died at Paris, 5th April 1778, aged 81. — Another of his name, Denis, was an eminent surgeon at Neufchateau, and very skilful in cutting for the stone. He died 17th March, 1746.

RIVAROL, Anthony de, a French writer, born at Bagnols in Languedoc, 17th April, 1757. He settled at Paris, and became the friend of the learned, of Voltaire, d'Alembert, and Buffon. He married early an English woman, but this union was unfortunate. On the breaking out of the revolution, he retired to Germany, and lived for some time at Hamburg and at Berlin, where he was honored by the notice of the royal family, and where he died 11th April 1801. He was a man of great information, and some genius. He published the Universality of the French Language, which obtained the prize of the Berlin academy, 1784 — Hell, translated from Dante — Letters on Religion and Morality — a little Almanack of great Men, a satire — Letters to the French Nobility, 1792, 8vo. — La Fayette's Political Life — Prospectus of a New Dictionary of the French Language — a Discourse on the Intellectual and Moral Faculties of Man, 4to. — poems. His life was published in 1802, 2 vols. 12mo.

RIVET DE LA GRANGE, Anthony, a learned Benedictine of Poitou. His History of France, 9 vols. 4to. employed 30 years of his life in the composition. He died 1749, aged 66.

RIVIERE, Henry Francis de la, a native of Paris, who embraced the profession of arms, and afterwards privately married the daughter of the count of Buffi-Rabutin, who was widow of the marquis of Coligni. This union was displeasing to her father, and produced not only a paper war, but a law-suit; but though the rights of the husband were established, the fickle fair refused to live with him. In consequence of this he retired to the seclusion of a monastic life in the oratory at Paris, where he died 1743, aged 94. He was author of Letters, 2 vols. 12mo. &c. His wife wrote also some letters, &c. which possess elegance of diction and interest.

RIVINUS, Andrew, a native of Hall in Saxony, whose real name was Barchmann. He was a physician, and became professor of poetry and philosophy at Leipzig, and died 4th April 1656, aged 56. His works are, Remarks on Ancient Christian Poets — Dissertations on Literary subjects, published under the title of Philo-Physiologia, 4to. — Veterum Scriptorum de Medicinâ Collectanea, 8vo. — Mysteria Medico-Physica, 12mo. &c.

RIVINUS, Augustus Quirinus, a professor of medicine at Leipzig, who died there 1722, aged 70, respected as an able practitioner and botanist. He wrote Introductio in Rem Herbariam, folio, with plates — Ordo Plantarum quæ sunt Flore Irregulari monopetalæ, tetrapetalæ, pentapetalæ, folio, with figures — Censura Medicamentorum Official. 4to. — Dissertationes Medicæ, 4to. — Manuductio ad

Chymiam Pharmaceuticam, 8vo. — Notitia Morborum.

RIZZIO, David, or RIZZI, an Italian musician, born at Turin. He came in the retinue of the Piedmontese ambassador to the court of Scotland, and as his abilities were very great as a musician and a singer, he became a favorite with queen Mary, who placed him near her person, and made him her secretary for foreign languages. His influence with his mistress, as well as his religion, proved highly offensive to the Scotch nobles, and especially to Darnley, her husband, who headed a conspiracy against him, and dispatched the unfortunate favorite with 56 wounds in the queen's presence, 1566. It is said that Rizzio's musical powers were exerted to polish and refine the Scotch airs, and to infuse into them that sweetness which is still so much admired.

ROBERT DE COURTENAY, French emperor of the East after his father Peter, 1218, was a weak prince, under whose reign the two empires of Trebizond and Thessalonica were established. He died of grief 1228, because his wife had been mutilated by a private gentleman of Burgundy, to whom she had been formerly betrothed, and who revenged this insult to his affection by cutting her lips and her nose.

ROBERT, elector palatine, was chosen emperor, 1400. He alienated the affections of the German princes to his government by his attachment to the anti-pope Gregory XII. and died 18th May 1410, aged 58, at a moment when a powerful combination had been formed to deprive him of the crown.

ROBERT, king of France, surnamed the Wise or the Devout, succeeded his father Hugh Capet, 996. He married Bertha, daughter of Conrad, king of Burgundy; but as she was his cousin, this union was annulled by the pope, Gregory V. and the monarch afterwards took for his second wife Constance, daughter of the count of Arles and Provence. He refused the crown of the empire and of Italy; better satisfied to reign over his native dominions, where he labored earnestly for the happiness of his people. He died at Melun, 20th July 1031, aged 60, much respected.

ROBERT of France, count d'Artois, brother of St. Louis, refused the empire of Germany offered to his ambition by pope Gregory IX. and he accompanied his brother to the Holy Land. He behaved with great valor at the battle of Maffourah, 9th Feb. 1250; but being too eager in pursuit of the flying enemy, he was attacked with stones, and perished.

ROBERT, count d'Artois, son of the preceding, was called the Good or the Noble. He was a very brave prince, and distinguished himself greatly in the African expedition, 1270, against the Arragonois in Sicily, 1289, against the English near Bayonne, and the Flemings at Furnes. He was killed in a battle with the Flemings near Courtrai, 1302.

ROBERT of Anjou, succeeded his father, Charles the lame, on the throne of Naples, 1309. He supported the papal power against the encroachments of the emperors, and died 19th Jan. 1343, aged 64, universally respected by his subjects and by foreign nations.

ROBERT the Magnificent, duke of Normandy, succeeded ceeded his brother Richard, 1028. In 1035 he undertook a pilgrimage on foot to the Holy Land, and on his return was poisoned at Nicæa in Bithynia. He was succeeded by his natural son William, better known as the Conqueror.

ROBERT, surnamed Short Shanks, was son of William the Conqueror, and obtained for his inheritance the dukedom of Normandy. He was in the holy wars, where he behaved with great valor; but on his return, he found himself stripped of the throne of England, which belonged to him, and afterwards he lost Normandy, and being made prisoner by his brother Henry, remained in long and cruel captivity till his death in 1134.

ROBERT BRUCE, a Scotch nobleman, who disputed the crown with John Baliol. The influence of Edward I. of England, prevailed in favor of his rival; but after his deposition, though watched by the English, he escaped from retirement, and appearing in the midst of his countrymen, he was unanimously elected king. He maintained his elevation by valor, and defeated the English at the famous battle of Bannockburn, 1314. Peace was afterwards re-established between the two kingdoms, and Robert devoted himself to advance the happiness and the prosperity of his subjects. He died 1329, and desired that his heart might be conveyed to Jerusalem, and buried in the holy sepulchre. He was succeeded by David II.

ROBERT, Nicholas, a native of Langres, eminent as a painter, in the service of Galton, duke of Orleans. His birds and plants, painted chiefly on vellum, were deservedly admired. He died 1684, aged 74.

ROBERT DE VAUGONDY, N. a French geographer born at Paris. His Atlas, in 108 maps is well known. He wrote Abridgment of the Different Systems of the World—Introduction to Geography—Sacred Geography, &c. and died at Paris 1766, aged 78.

ROBERTELLO, Francis, author of some commentaries on the Greek and Latin poets, and other works; was professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Padua, where he died 1567.

ROBERTSON, William, an eminent divine, born in Dublin, 16th Oct. 1705. From Dublin he went to Glasgow university where he distinguished himself as a zealous defender of the rights of the students to elect their rector, in which cause after much trouble, and great obloquy he at last succeeded. His conduct on this occasion recommended him to the notice of lord King, bishop Hoadly, and other leading characters, and he afterwards took orders and went to settle in Ireland, as rector of Ravilly in the county of Carlow. Other preferments followed, and he acquired some distinction among the clergy by freeing his parishioners from tithes, and by defending in pamphlets his conduct. Thus popular and in the way of procuring higher ecclesiastical honors, he happened to read "Free and Candid Disquisitions," which totally changed his ideas with respect to his profession, and at last induced him in 1764 to resign all his preferments. About 1766 he returned to London, and was complimented in consequence of his "Apology of his Faith and Conduct," by his alma mater of Glasgow, with the degree of D. D. In 1768 he was appointed by the company of Merchant Taylors, master of Woolverhampton free school. He died there 20th May, 1783, and was buried in the church-yard of the new church.

ROBERTSON, George, a landscape painter born in London. He travelled over Italy under the patronage of Mr. Beckford, and greatly improved himself there. He afterwards went to Jamaica, of which island he published six beautiful views, and on his return to London taught young ladies for his subsistence. His trees, and particularly his leaves, are much admired. His beauties resembled much those of Salvator Rosa. He died 1788.

ROBERTSON, Joseph, a native of Knipe, Westmorland, educated at Appleby school, which he quitted in 1746 to enter at Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. When in orders he obtained Heriard vicarage, Hants, and in 1770 was presented to Sutton rectory in Essex, and nine years after to Horncastle vicarage in Lincolnshire. He possessed eminent literary talents, and from 1764 to 1785, supported by his able criticisms the character of the Critical Review. He was also author of a small volume called Introduction to the Study of Polite Literature, 1782, and in 1785 he published his valuable essay on Punctuation, and three years after his dissertation on the Parian Chronicle, which excited some controversy. His translation of Telemachus with the author's life, and learned notes, appeared in 1795, and in 1798, an Essay on the Education of Young Ladies. His Essay on the Nature of English verse was published 1799, and he died 1802.

ROBERTSON, William, a celebrated historian born in Scotland 1721. He was educated at Edinburgh university, and from his earliest years evinced the most laudable application, and the strongest wishes of distinguishing himself in literature. His first and greatest work, the History of Charles V. was followed by the History of Scotland, in which he labored earnestly to vindicate the character of the unfortunate Mary. His next work was the History of America, which is unfinished, and afterwards he published a disquisition concerning India. These popular compositions did not pass to the perusal of the public unrewarded. The author was made principal of the university of Edinburgh, historiographer to the king for Scotland, one of his majesty's chaplains for Scotland, and one of the ministers of the Old Grey-friars church, Edinburgh, and he might have risen to higher honors, if he had been willing to remove from Scotland into the English church. As a preacher zealous, active, and pious, he acquired no less fame than as an elegant, well informed and luminous historian. His learning and abilities have conferred immortal honor, not only on the university over which he presided with such dignity, but on the whole kingdom; and the History of Charles V. will be read to the latest times with increasing approbation. This worthy man left two sons and three daughters, and died universally, and most deservedly, esteemed, at Grange-house, Edinburgh, June, 1793. His works have passed through several editions. He published besides a sermon before the Scotch society for promoting christian knowledge.

ROBERVAL, Gilles Personne, sieur de, author of a treatise treatise on Mechanics, inserted in the Harmony of father Merfennus, and of an edition of Ariftarchus Samius, was a native of Roberval in Beauvais. He was professor of mathematics at Paris, and in his philosophical inquiries had some disputes with Descartes. He died 27th Oct. 1675, aged 73.

ROBESPIERRE, Maximilian Isidore, a sanguinary demagogue during the French revolution. He was born at Arras of poor parents, 1759, and was educated at the expence of the bishop of the diocese. After studying at Paris he applied himself to the law, and in 1784 obtained the prize of the academy of Metz, by his discourse on the disgrace which attends the relations of criminals. At the meeting of the constituent assembly he obtained a seat, and began now to distinguish himself more by the originality of his observations, than his eloquence. Though not visibly engaged in the atrocious scenes of the 20th of June, of the 10th August, and of September, he was anxious to reap the fruit of those bloody transactions, and when admitted into the convention he artfully employed his influence, and the darkest intrigues to render his opponents unpopular, and to lead them to the scaffold. With the criminal wish of being declared dictator, he hastened the destruction of the unfortunate Louis, and persecuted his innocent family, and after making Danton, Hebert, and others, the guilty ministers of his atrocious deeds, he prevailed upon the intimidated convention to send them to the guillotine. France was now filled with denunciations, in every province, and in every town tribunals were erected, which condemned alike the innocent and the guilty, and no man could with safety, intrust his secrets, or his life into the hands of his parent, his neighbour, or his friend. Suspicious, timid, and irresolute, the tyrant yet had sufficient art to interpret the machinations formed against his power as treason against the republic, and to sacrifice his personal enemies, and his public rivals as the most abandoned and perfidious citizens of France. Proscription thus followed proscription, and every day the streets of Paris exhibited the melancholy procession of wretched victims dragged to the scaffold, on the accusation of persons whom they had never known, and for crimes which they never had meditated. If he had known how to spare, Robespierre might have longer continued to direct the government of France; but his cowardly conduct in sacrificing those who were ready to be his associates and ministers in the vilest deeds, at last roused the courage of a few, who suspected that they were next marked for destruction. The tyrant and his two accomplices Couthon, and St. Just, were suddenly impeached in the convention, and "down with the tyrant," were the only exclamations which were heard on all sides when these bloody assassins attempted to ascend the tribune to defend themselves. In vain the commune of Paris took up arms against the convention to protect its accused leaders, Robespierre was conducted as a criminal, fearful and suppliant, and no longer haughty and ferocious, to the Hotel-de-Ville, where a gen-d'arme discovering him in the midst of the uproar and confusion, concealed in an obscure corner, fired a pistol at him, and broke to pieces his lower jaw. Extended on a table, in the severest agonies, yet without uttering a groan, the tyrant viewed in silence the preparations made for his punishment. On the morrow, 28th July, 1794, at four in the evening he was carried with 22 of his accomplices, amidst the groans, the hisses, and the rejoicings of the populace, to that scaffold where he had made to bleed so many thousand innocent victims. Such was the influence of this sanguinary monster, that France forgot her religion and her honor at his command; but after he had seen the altars insulted, the churches thrown down, and public worship abolished, he claimed the merit of restoring to the Supreme Being some share in the government of the universe, and he appeared in the name of the convention, as the priest and founder of a new religion, and decreed with great solemnity that a god existed in the world.

ROBIN-HOOD, the leader of a band of robbers, who issued out from the recesses of Sherwood forest, Nottinghamshire, and spread terror and confusion over the kingdom. This formidable body of depredators, over which presided Little John, as second in command, continued their plundering life with success, and with little opposition, from the year 1189 to 1247. Some authors have asserted that Robin-Hood was no other but Robert earl of Huntingdon, whom the malice of his enemies banished from the favor of the first Richard.

ROBINS, Benjamin, an eminent mathematician, born at Bath, 1707. His parents were quakers, and possessed of little property, yet he received some instruction, which, by severe application, he greatly improved. His knowledge of mathematics was such that he was recommended to Dr. Pemberton, and went to live in London, as mathematical teacher. Here, besides his professional engagements, he devoted much time in perusing the works of the most celebrated mathematicians in ancient and modern times; and as a proof of his abilities he published in the Philosophical Transactions, 1727, a demonstration of the last proposition of Newton's treatise on Quadratures. The next year he attacked in the present state of the republic of letters, Bernouilli's dissertation in support of Leibnitz's Opinion of the Force of Bodies in Motion. After bestowing much attention on gunnery, and visiting some of the best fortified places in Flanders, he engaged in a controversy against Dr. Berkeley's Analyst on the Fluxionary Method, and published in 1735, a discourse concerning the nature and certainty of sir I. Newton's Method of Fluxions, and of prime and ultimate ratios. He afterwards defended sir Isaac against Baxter, and printed Remarks on Euler's Treatise of Motion, &c. In 1739 he published three political pamphlets, which attracted much of the public attention, and in 1742, appeared his New Principles of Gunnery, a work of merit, and the result of his own laborious experiments. In 1748, lord Anson's Voyage round the World was published, and though it appeared under the name of Walter, the chaplain of the centurion, it is clearly ascertained that the whole work was written by Robins, from the materials furnished by the journals, and the observations of the reverend gentleman. He afterwards wrote an apology for the unfortunate affair of Preston-pans, in favor of sir John Cope, and by the protection of lord Anson, he was employed in superintending intending the improvements made in Greenwich observatory. His reputation was now such that he was offered to go to Paris as commissioner, to settle the boundaries of Acadia, or to proceed to the East Indies as general engineer of the company, in visiting and repairing their forts, and he accepted this last honorable appointment. He reached India in 1750, and immediately formed plans for the improvement of the forts of Madras, and of St. David; but unfortunately did not live to see them carried into execution. The climate proved unfavorable to his constitution, and a gradual consumption proved fatal, 29th July, 1751. He left the publication of his works to his friends, Martin Folkes, and James Wilson, and they appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1761.

ROBINSON, Robert, a native of Swaffham, Norfolk. He was well educated at the public grammar school of his native town; but the indigence of his parents was ill calculated to support further expences at the university, and, therefore, he was apprenticed to a hair-dresser. Instead of shaving, and of combing wigs with diligence, he paid more attention to books, and by the preaching of Whitfield, he became a convert to methodism. With enthusiasm he now embraced the tenets of Calvin, which he soon after exchanged for those of the baptists, and then settled at Cambridge, where his abilities and eloquence were exerted with great success in his appeals to crowded audiences. The respectable character which he here supported, endeared him not only to the inhabitants of Cambridge, but to some of the learned in the university, and his Plea of the Divinity of Christ, when published, proved to the world that he was not destitute of talents, nor of the powers of argumentation. He was in 1785, invited to preach to the baptists in London; but after some trials, he preferred his farm at Chesterton, near Cambridge, and the approbation of his neighbours, to the uncertain profits of a residence in the metropolis. He died in the summer of 1790, at Birmingham, where he had gone on a visit to Dr. Priestley, aged 55. He published besides a translation of Saurin's Sermons, 4 vols. 8vo. — an Essay on the Composition of a Sermon — a History of Baptism, &c. In the latter part of life he was a Socinian. It is said that when at Cambridge he was offered honorable preferment if he would enter into the church, which he modestly declined.

ROBINSON, Tancred, fellow of the Royal society and of the college of physicians, was an able physician. He wrote some ingenious papers on Natural History, and also medical books, and died 1748, advanced in life.

ROBINSON, Mary, known for her genius and misfortunes, was born at Bristol where her father, of the name of Darby, an American, was captain of a ship. After receiving her education under the able care of Hannah More, and her sisters, she married at the early age of 15, a Mr. Robinson, an attorney, and this connection proved the source of much misery. Her husband was unfortunate and extravagant, and after accompanying him to a jail, she turned her thoughts to the stage for support. As her person was pleasing, and her abilities very respectable, she appeared with credit in the characters of Juliet, Ophelia, Rosalind, Imogen, Viola, &c. Whilst thus rising in the public estimation, and under the patronage of Garrick, she unfortunately attracted, in the character of Perdita, the attention of the prince of W. and those who ought to have defended his virtue, became the criminal encouragers of a licentious amour, which this frail woman had not the prudence to withstand. She left the stage for the guilty protection of her Florizel; but, such is the fate of illicit love, she soon became indifferent in the eyes of the once enraptured prince. Thus cut off from the protection of a husband, from whom she had separated, and lost to virtue and to honor, she became for support the degraded mistress of profligate men. She fell a victim to a violent rheumatism, and died at the end of 1800, aged 42, and was buried in Old Windsor church-yard, where some elegant lines from the pen of Mr. Pratt, mark her untimely tomb. She wrote a number of poetical trifles under the name Laura Maria — Vancenzen, a romance — poems, 2 vols. 8vo. — Nobody, an unsuccessful farce — and memoirs of her life have appeared under the care of her daughter.

ROBINSON, Richard, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Westminster school, from which he was elected to Christ church, Oxford. He was made prebendary of York, and vicar of Aldborough by archbishop Blackburne, to whom he was chaplain, and in 1751, he went as chaplain to the duke of Dorset in Ireland, and obtained the bishopric of Killala. In 1759, he was translated to Leighlin and Ferns, two years after to Kildare, and in 1765, to the primacy of Armagh, and in 1777, he was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of baron Rokeby. He employed the munificent patronage which he possessed in the most liberal manner, and not only built an elegant palace at Armagh, which he adorned with an observatory, but he founded a school, and built four new churches. He died 10th Oct. 1794.

ROBINSON, John, a Scotchman, who became director of the marine cadet academy at Cronstadt in Russia, and on his return to Scotland was made professor of chemistry at Glasgow. He afterwards became professor of natural philosophy at Edinburgh, where he was honored with the degree of L.L.D. Besides elements of mechanical philosophy, and some articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica, he published in 1797, Proofs of a Conspiracy, a work which together with that of the abbé Baruel on the same subject, produced a great sensation in Europe, and in tracing the various causes of the French revolution, proved that it proceeded from a conspiracy among the illuminati of France and Germany, for the destruction of all society, of morality and religion in the world. Dr. Robison died at Edinburgh 1805.

ROCHEFORT, William de, author of a Translation of Sophocles — of a Refutation of M. Rabaud's System of Nature — of Ulysses, Antigone, and Electra, three tragedies — of a Critical History of the Opinions of the Ancients on Happiness, &c. was a native of Lyons, and member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres at Paris. He died 1788, universally and deservedly respected.

ROCHEFOUCAULT, Francis, duke of, a French noble.

nobleman of celebrity, born 1613. He distinguished himself in the wars of la Fronde, and for some time was deprived of sight by the blow of a musket. He is known as the author of Memoirs of the Regency of Anne of Austria, 2 vols. 12mo. — and “Maximes, or Sentences,” which, says Voltaire, have contributed, more than any other performance, to form the taste of the French nation. His Memoirs, adds that author, are read, but the Maxims are learnt by heart. He died 1680.

ROCHESTER, John Wilmot, earl of, a celebrated wit at the court of the second Charles, born April, 1648. He was well educated at Burford school, and then entered at Wadham college, Oxford, and afterwards travelled over France and Italy. He was in 1665 in the action at Bergen, under lord Sandwich, when an attack was made on the Dutch fleet that had taken shelter there, and he was in another engagement, in both of which he displayed great intrepidity and coolness, though his courage was afterwards called in question for refusing to fight a duel with lord Mulgrave. The excellent qualities of his mind were, however, ruined by the dissipation of the court, and so fond of intemperance and of voluptuous indulgence did he gradually show himself, that he was the greatest libertine of the age, and was, for five years, as he confessed to Dr. Burnet, in a continual state of intoxication. This gross sensuality, accompanied with the greatest contempt of decency and of religion, was sometimes chequered by fits of study and literature; but unfortunately the elegant powers of language and of poetry which he possessed were prostituted to the most lascivious and disgusting subjects. Thus devoted to low gratifications, the lamp of life was soon extinguished, and at the age of 31 he found all the debilities and the rapid decay of extreme old age. Sickness at last brought on reflection, and in a moment of contrition he sent for Dr. Burnet, to whom he opened his heart, and the alarming state of his conscience, and after living an atheist and a libertine, he prepared himself to die a good Christian, and a sincere penitent. That his contrition was from the heart the most scrupulous may be convinced from the account of his last moments, by his spiritual guide, Burnet. He expired 29th July, 1680, leaving a son behind him, who died the next year, and three daughters. The writings of this licentious nobleman have, unfortunately for religion and morality, been too much and too extensively dispersed, and not perhaps with the antidote which his contrition and a death-bed repentance should convey to the profligate mind. Many of the obscene writings of the times have no doubt been attributed to him which he never wrote; and the advocates of lewdness and seduction have taken advantage of his infamous celebrity too often to shelter their poisonous productions under his name. Besides his licentious poems, he wrote a tragedy, called Valentinian, and a speech, delivered in the character of a mountebank, a profession which for some time he followed with great success in Tower-street. His wit rendered him a cheerful companion, and at the court he was regarded as lively and facetious, full of mirth, repartee, and extravagance.

ROCHON DE CHABANNES, Mark Anthony James, a French dramatic writer, who died at Paris in the spring of 1800, aged 70. Some of his operas met with great success on the French theatre. Besides his plays, which are collected in 2 vols. 8vo. he wrote la Noblesse Oisive, and other works.

RODNEY, George Brydges lord, a brave English admiral, son of a naval officer, of a Somersetshire family, was born about 1718. He was early engaged in the naval service of his country, and in 1751, was promoted to the rank of commodore, and in 1759, employed, as admiral, to bombard Havre de Grace. In 1761, he was sent against Martinico, and for his great services in that expedition was made knight of the bath. The return of peace, and interference in a severely disputed election at Northampton, rendered his pecuniary resources very scanty, and he fled to France to escape the importunities of his creditors. His distresses were seen by the French government, and very liberal offers were made to him to enter into the service of the king of France, a proposal which he rejected with becoming indignation. This noble conduct was not, however, buried in oblivion. It was honorably mentioned by M. Sartine the French minister to the English government, and Rodney, at the invitation of lord Sandwich, returned to serve his country. He was immediately placed at the head of a fleet, and had the good fortune, in 1780, to capture a Spanish convoy near Cadiz, and a few weeks after to defeat the squadron of admiral Langara, by the capture of five ships of the line. This great success was the prelude of new victories. In 1781 he took St. Eustathius from the Dutch, and on the 12th April, 1782, he obtained a complete triumph over de Grasse's fleet in the West Indies, by the sinking of one ship and the capture of five others. For these glorious services he was raised to the peerage, and had a pension of 2000l. a-year settled upon him, and every other demonstration of respect and gratitude was shown by a nation which so well knows how to reward her brave defenders and her heroic chiefs. Lord Rodney died 1792.

RODOLPH, duke of Swabia, husband to Matilda, sister of the emperor Henry IV. was elected king of Germany 1077, by some of the German insurgents. After doubtful battles he was at last defeated at Wolcksheim, and perished in the field.

RODOLPH I. of Hapsburg, surnamed the Clement, was elected emperor of Germany 1273. Though he refused to go to Rome to be crowned by the pope, he made a treaty of alliance with him. He made war against Ottocar king of Bohemia, and obtained with victory the cession of Austria, Styria, and Carniola. This disgrace, and the doing of homage to the conqueror disgusted Ottocar, and by the advice of his queen he renewed the war, and was defeated and slain at the battle of Marckfeld near Vienna, 26th Aug. 1278. The emperor died at Gemersheim, 30th Sep. 1291, aged 73.

RODOLPH II. son of Maximilian II. was born at Vienna 1552. He was made king of Hungary 1572, of of Bohemia and of the Romans 1575, and the following year elected emperor on his father's death. He was an irresolute and unfortunate monarch, his dominions were invaded by the Turks, and he showed neither spirit nor courage to repels the attack, and when his brother Matthias revolted from him he yielded up to him with little opposition the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary. He was very superstitious, and though he patronized learned men, he had the weakness to listen to the suggestions of astrologers. He died unmarried 20th Jan. 1612, aged 60.

ROE, for Thomas, an eminent statesman, born at Low Layton, Essex, 1580. He resided for about two years at Magdalen college, Oxford, and then studied at one of the inns of court. He was knighted by James 1604, and 1614 went as ambassador to the court of the Great Mogul, where he continued four years. In 1621, he went as ambassador to the Grand Signior, and remained there till 1628. During his residence abroad, not only the commercial interests of his country were his chief concern, but also literature, and he made a most valuable collection of MSS. in the Greek and Oriental languages, which at his return he presented to the Bodleian library. He brought also as a present from Cyril, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. the famous Alexandrian MS. of the Greek bible, since transcribed and published by Dr. Grabe. In 1629, he successfully negotiated a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, and in that embassy gained the confidence and friendship of the great Gustavus Adolphus, whom he advised to make a descent on Germany to restore the freedom of the empire, which he actually effected. In 1640, sir Thomas was elected member for Oxford, and afterwards went again as ambassador to Ratisbon in favor of the king of Bohemia's son. At his return he was made chancellor of the garter, and privy counsellor. He died 1644, no doubt broken in heart to see the disastrous affairs of the times. His curious account of his negotiations, &c. at the Porte were published 1740. There are besides published of his, Speeches in Parliament — a Discourse on the Spanish King's Seizure of the Valteline, &c.

ROEMER, Olaus, a Danish astronomer, born at Arhusen in Jutland, 1644, and educated at Copenhagen. He accompanied back to Paris Picard, who had been sent by the French king to make observations in the North, and so great did his knowledge of mathematics appear, that he was appointed to instruct the dauphin. After 10 years' residence at Paris he was, in 1681, recalled back to Copenhagen by Christian V. and made professor of astronomy there. His abilities were employed in reforming the coin of the kingdom, and in measuring the roads. He died at Copenhagen 1710, leaving no literary work behind him. Some of his observations were published by his pupil Horrebow in 1735, under the title of Basis Astronomiæ, &c. His observations on light were noticed and applauded as correct by the great Newton.

ROENTGEN, N. a German artist, born at Neuwied. His great talents were employed and liberally rewarded by the empress Catharine of Russia, and the palace of Petersburg still exhibits the beautiful monuments in his genius and workmanship. He died at the end of the 18th century.

ROEPPEL, Conrad, a painter born at the Hague. He died 1748, aged 71. His fruit trees and flowers were much admired.

ROESTRAETEN, Peter, a native of Haerlem, 1698, eminent as a portrait painter. He was also very successful in his representations of musical instruments of vases, shells, agates, &c.

ROGER, first king of Sicily, conquered Apulia, Calabria, and Naples, and by embracing the party of the antipope Anacletus he strengthened his power. He took Innocent II. prisoner, and restored him to liberty only upon his confirming his dominions in Italy. He afterwards made war against the Eastern empire, and after plundering Athens, Corinth, Negropont, &c. and advancing to the gates of Constantinople, he returned to Sicily loaded with booty. He died 1154, aged 58.

ROGER, Charles, an eminent printer at Paris in the 16th century. He edited several valuable books.

ROGER, Joseph Louis, a physician of Strasburg, who died 1761. He published Latin dissertations on the palpitation of muscular fibres, &c.

ROGER, prior of Hexham, was, about 1138, author of an History of the Campaign of the Scotch Army under king David, when the famous battle of the standard was fought.

ROGERS, Woods, an English navigator, known for his expedition against the Spanish settlements in the South seas, in a small ship of war from Bristol. He returned to his country 1711, after surrounding the globe, and published an account of his voyage. He died 1732. His works have appeared in French, 3 vols. 12mo.

ROGERS, John, an English divine, educated at Cambridge. He was for some time chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, and on the succession of Edward VI. he returned home and obtained a prebend of St. Paul's church. As he was an eloquent and zealous preacher, he was marked for persecution in Mary's reign, and was the first who suffered martyrdom at the stake in Smithfield, 1555. He had assisted Coverdale and Tindal in translating the bible into English.

ROGERS, John, an able divine, born 1679, at Ensham, Oxfordshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at New college school, and became fellow of Corpus Christi, and in 1712, went to London as lecturer of St. Clement Danes. He obtained in 1716, the rectory of Wrington, Somersetshire, and about that time married lord Coleraine's sister. He engaged in 1719, in the Bangorian controversy, and he acquired on that occasion so much credit by his discourse on the visible and invisible church of Christ, that the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of D. D. in 1721. He obtained a canonry, and the office of subdean, in the cathedral of Wells, and in 1728, when he wished for the retirement of a country life, he was promoted to the living of St. Giles', Cripplegate, London. He died six months after, May, 1, 1729. He was buried in Ensham church, where a handsome monument records his virtues. After his death were published 4 vols. of his sermons — a

Persua-

Perfusive to Conformity, addressed to Dissenters, &c. He wrote besides, a Defence of Christianity against Collins' Scheme of Literal Prophecy, &c.

ROGHMAN, Roland, a native of Amsterdam, distinguished as a landscape painter. He died 1686, aged 89.

ROHAN, Henry duke of, a peer of France, prince of Leon, born at Blein castle in Brittany, 1579. He gained the friendship of Henry IV. by his bravery at the siege of Amiens, and afterwards distinguished himself at the head of the Huguenots, for whom he obtained a very advantageous peace with Lewis XIII. From France he passed into the service of Venice, and was made general in chief of the armies of that republic against the imperialists. He was then recalled by Lewis XIII. and his abilities were employed in negotiation as well as in war, but the jealousy of Richelieu drove him to Geneva. From Geneva he went to join the arms of his friend the duke of Saxe Weimar against the imperialists, and was fatally wounded in battle, and died six weeks after, 13th April, 1638. His memoirs of the political affairs of France, &c. from 1610 to 1629, in 2 vols. 12mo. are much admired. He wrote besides, the Interest of Princes, printed Cologne, 1666, 12mo. — on the Government of the 13 Cantons — an Abridgment of Cæsar's Commentaries, &c. His sister Anne possessed merit as a Hebrew scholar, and as the writer of some excellent verses.

ROHAULT, James, a French philosopher, born at Amiens 1620. He studied at Paris, and was well versed in the philosophy of the ancients, but attached himself most zealously to the popular doctrines of Des Cartes, and wrote an account of them under the title of "Physics." This work, written in French, was translated into Latin by Dr. Samuel Clarke, and adapted to the system of Newton's philosophy, and it has also appeared in English, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote besides, Elements of Mathematics — treatise of Mechanics, &c. and died 1675, respected as a man of learning and probity.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIERE, J. M. a native of Villefranche near Lyons. As he was the youngest of five brothers, who, though of respectable family, were left poor and early orphans, he determined to quit his native town in quest of his fortune, and at the age of 19, not to enter into the ecclesiastical profession, he left home and travelled on foot to Nantes. Here he was dissuaded from going to the East Indies on account of the bad state of his health, and therefore he removed to Rouen, where he had the good fortune to be noticed, and to find his knowledge of commerce and political economy rewarded by the appointment of inspector general at Amiens, and afterwards at Lyons. His travels in Switzerland, Italy, and other countries, tended to enlarge his understanding, and to render him known as an able and well informed writer. His Memoirs on the Rearing of Cattle, and the Preparing of Wool, 4to. — his Art on the Printing of Woollen, and Cotton Stuffs — and his Letters from Sicily, Switzerland, Malta, and Italy, were read with avidity and with interest, and therefore at the revolution he was easily selected as one of the deputies from Lyons. His abilities recommended him to the court, and he became one of the ministers of Lewis XVI. but instead of conciliating the good opinion of his master, he offended his feelings by his republican conduct, his coarse affected manners, and the singularity of his dress. Though driven from the ministry by the monarch, he was restored by the voice of the people; but whilst he labored for the establishment of liberty, he often permitted those excesses which proved so fatal to the dearest interests of France. He resisted, indeed, with manly indignation the violence of faction, and wished to repress the massacres of September, but in vain. The popular fury was too strong to permit a man of independent spirit to continue long in power, and when the fall of Brissot and of the Girondists was determined, Roland saw his fate decreed in theirs, and he escaped from Paris at the moment when his person was going to be seized. He retired to Rouen, where he might have concealed his misfortunes; but when he heard that his wife had perished on the scaffold, he resolved not to survive her, and going about four leagues from Rouen on the Paris road he stabbed himself to the heart, 15th Nov. 1793. He wrote besides, a dictionary of manufactures and the arts depending upon them, 3 vols. 4to. &c.

ROLAND, Mary Jane Philipon, wife of the preceding, was born at Paris 1754, and received from her father, who was an engraver of merit, an excellent education. Early devoted to books she acquired a very extensive knowledge of the arts, and became known for her wit and learning. At the age of 25 she married Roland though much older than herself, and when he was raised to consequence in the revolution, she lent all the resources of her mind to assist him, and often wrote the dispatches and letters which were to issue from his hands. Her house was the receptacle of the learned, the powerful, and the intriguing, and she was the soul of the party, and secretly guided many of the public measures which were proposed in the convention. Her influence escaped not, however, without envy, and when accused she appeared before the convention and cleared herself with all the graceful energy of innocence. When her husband was proscribed, she hoped to be permitted to remain secure at Paris; but in vain, she was soon after seized and sent to prison, and after five months' confinement she was dragged to the scaffold, as the active accomplice of the Girondists. She was guillotined 8th Nov. 1793, aged 41, and as she expired she exclaimed, O liberty what crimes are committed in thy name. Her works consist of tracts on melancholy, morality, friendship, Socrates, &c. besides memoirs which she wrote during her captivity, and in which she gave an interesting history, or appeal to posterity, about her husband, his conduct, his ministry, and their private life. She also published an account of her travels in England and Switzerland, two places where she imbibed true principles of liberty and government. In her character she was an amiable woman, but unfortunately her partiality for republican liberty tinged her conduct with an affectation of Roman virtues and ancient forms. Respectable in private life, and followed as a woman of superior information and great talents of mind, mind, she might at any other period have most powerfully contributed by her example and by her writings to the recommendation of virtue, and to the happiness of mankind.

ROLAND D'ERCEVILLE, B. G. president of the parliament of Paris, was a learned and popular character, but all his merits could not save him from the revolutionary tribunal. He was guillotined 20th April, 1794, aged 64. He wrote a Letter on the Authority of the States of France, 12mo. — Discourse on the Je-suits — Plan of Education, &c.

ROLLE, Michael, a French mathematician, born at Ambert in Auvergne, 1652. He for some time maintained himself by writing for an attorney; but by attending mathematical lectures became himself a popular lecturer, and afterwards a respected member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a treatise on Algebra — Methods of resolving undetermined Questions in Algebra, &c. and died 1719.

ROLLIN, Charles, an eminent French writer, born at Paris 30th Jan. 1661. He was intended for the business of his father, a master cutler, but his genius was happily discovered by a Benedictine, and he was permitted to study in the college of Plessis, where his abilities soon procured him the appellation of the Divine. He succeeded his beloved master, Herian, in 1687, as professor of rhetoric and eloquence, and in 1694, he was appointed rector of the university. In these important offices he distinguished himself by his zeal for the improvement of his pupils and the honor of learning, and by his example and attention the Greek language was cultivated with great attention, and emulation introduced among the students. In 1699, he was made coadjutor to the college of Beauvais, which his reputation soon rendered popular, respectable, and flourishing; but in 1712, the disputes between the jesuits and jansenists proved fatal to his repose. By the influence of Teller, the king's confessor, the tool of the jesuits, he was driven from his appointments and retired to privacy. In 1720, he was chosen again rector by the university of Paris; but two months after the election was disannulled by a lettre de cachet, and from that time Rollin devoted himself in retirement to the composition of his excellent works. His valuable publications are, an edition of Quintilian, 2 vols. — treatise on Studying and Teaching the Belles Lettres, 4 vols. — Ancient History of the Egyptians, Carthaginians, Babylonians, &c. 13 vols. — the Roman History from the Foundation of the City to the Battle of Actium, completed to the time of Constantine by his pupil Crevier, and published in 16 vols. 12mo. — Miscellaneous Discourses, Lectures, &c. This learned man was as amiable in private life as he was respected in public; pious, benevolent, and humane, the friend of virtue, morality, and religion. So highly respected was he among his countrymen, that the poet Rousseau ventured from his banishment in disguise to Paris to see and converse with the venerable professor. Voltaire has deservedly passed high eulogiums on his merits as an historian, and called his Ancient History the best compilation in any language, correct, eloquent, and pleasing. He died 14th Sep. 1741.

ROLLIUS, Reinhold Henry, a German philologist, author of two Latin works containing the lives of philosophers, poets, historians, orators, &c. published 1709.

ROLLO, a Norwegian chieftian, driven from his country by the king of Denmark. He landed in Normandy, of which he obtained the sovereignty by the permission of Charles the Simple, 912, who gave him his daughter Gifelle in marriage. He on this occasion became a convert to christianity, and took upon him the title of duke of Normandy. He was the ancestor of William the Conqueror, and died about 932.

ROLLOCK, Robert, a native of Stirlingshire, educated at St. Leonard's college, St. Andrew's, where he took his master's degree, 1582. On the foundation of Edinburgh university by James VI. in 1587, he was appointed first principal and divinity professor, though not more than 28 years of age. His great application and sedentary life brought on the stone and gravel, of which he died 1601, aged 41. His Commentaries on the Ephesians — the Revelations — St. John's Gospel — and Daniel, in Latin, have been much admired. He wrote some sermons besides.

ROMAINE, William, an English divine, born at Hartlepool, Durham, 1714. He entered at Hertford college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Christ-church, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. For some years he was a popular preacher before the university; but the love of singularity, and a propensity to the doctrines of Calvin, prevailed upon him to seek for distinction in the applauses of a London audience. He was elected lecturer of St. Dunstan in the West 1749, to which was afterwards added the offices of morning preacher at St. George's, Hanover square, and of astronomical professor of Gresham college, which he soon resigned. He was in 1764 appointed rector of St. Ann's, Black-friars, and when not engaged in the itinerant labors of the ministry, he continued to collect there and at St. Dunstan's, those numerous congregations which admired the vehemence of methodistical effusions, and the familiar addresses of a vociferous preacher. He published various sermons and tracts, which have been edited in 8 vols. 8vo. and he also edited in 1749 Calasio's Concordance to the Hebrew bible, 4 vols. folio, in which he made some unpardonable alterations in favor of the then prevalent doctrine of Hutchinson. He died 1795. His life has been published by Cadogan.

ROMANELLI, John Francis, a painter, born at Viterbo. He was the pupil of Cortona, and was patronized by the pope, and elected head of the academy of St. Luke. His abilities were noticed by Mazarine, and recommended to the French king, who created him knight of St. Michael; but he preferred a residence in his native country, where he died 1662, aged 45. His historical pieces are much admired. His son Urban was also eminent as a painter, and died 1682, aged 44.

ROMANO, Julio, an Italian painter, born at Rome, 1492. He was the pupil and the friend of Raphael, and was made the heir of that illustrious artist. He was patronized by Leo X. and by Clement VII. and afterwards met with great encouragement at Mantua, under under the marquis Frederic Gonzaga. He died 1546. He was distinguished in architecture as well as painting. His learning gave him great advantage over contemporary artists, and he derived, from the study of the ancients, that judgment and taste which he displayed in the ancient edifices, porticoes, vestibules, and theatres introduced into his pieces. The best of his pieces are said to be the fall of the giants, and the battles of Constantine.

ROMANUS I. emperor of the East, surnamed Lecapenus, was a native of Armenia, and was raised to distinction, from the obscurity of a common soldier, by saving the life of the emperor Basil in a battle against the Saracens. By marrying his daughter, Constantine X. cemented the union which existed between them, and he then raised him as his associate on the throne, 919. In his elevation Romanus displayed great powers of mind; he defeated the Muscovites and the Turks, and to superior military talents he joined the milder virtues of humanity and benevolence. When he wished to restore greater powers in the empire to his son-in-law Constantine, he was driven, by the jealousy of his own son Stephen, into a monastery, where he died 948.

ROMANUS II. the Younger, was son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, whom he succeeded 959. He was an effeminate and worthless prince; he drove his mother Helena from the palace, and obliged his sisters to prostitute themselves, and he destroyed himself by his intemperance and debauchery, 963. During his short reign Phocas, his general, was successful against the Saracens in Candia.

ROMANUS III. son of Leo, the imperial general, obtained the crown by marrying Zoe, the daughter of Constantine the Younger, 1028. His indolence, and the success of the Saracens, who seized upon Syria, offended his subjects, and his wife, having fallen in love with Michael, the treasurer of the empire, determined to depose her husband, and raise her favorite to the throne in his stead. Romanus was therefore poisoned, and afterwards strangled, April, 1034.

ROMANUS IV. surnamed Diogenes, by marrying Eudoxia, the widow of Constantine Ducas, ascended the throne of Constantinople. He marched against the Turks, and defeated them; but in 1071 he was unfortunately taken prisoner by Asan, the enemy's general, who, instead of insulting his misfortunes, generously set him at liberty. On his return he found the throne usurped by Michael, the son of his predecessor, and in a subsequent battle, he was defeated by his rival, who cruelly ordered his eyes to be put out. Romanus died in consequence of the operation, A. 1071.

ROMANZOFF, N. marshal de, a distinguished Russian general. He defeated the Turks, 1770, at the battle of the Pruth, and then at Kagoul, where 100,000 of the enemy were left on the field; and thus, by his extraordinary successes, he contributed to the enlargement of the Russian dominions, and to the free navigation of the Black sea, and of the Dardanelles. He received with modesty the presents and the honors which the gratitude of Catherine heaped upon him, and afterwards went with Paul, the grand duke, to the court of Berlin, where Frederic the Great received him with every mark of esteem and respect. In the war of 1787, he refused to share the command with the favorite Potemkin, and was permitted, on account of his great age, to retire from the service, and he died soon after, universally respected as one of the greatest warriors of the age.

ROMBOUTS, Theodore, a painter of Antwerp, the pupil of Jansens. He was very successful in historical subjects, but particularly excelled in the representation of low scenes, ale-houses, markets, musicians, &c. He had the vanity to oppose his productions to the labors of his contemporary Rubens, and by this comparison in some degree robbed his pieces of the merit which they, uncomparated with others, possessed. He died 1637, aged 40.

ROME DE L'ISLE, John Baptist, a native of Gray in Franche Comté, who, from his birth, devoted himself to observations on mineralogy and natural history. He possessed great abilities, but in his opinions differed from other mineralogists, and thus gave rise to opposition. He published among other works, Crystallography, 4 vols. 8vo. — Exterior Characters of Minerals, 8vo. — Metrology, 8vo. — Letters to Bertrand on the Polype of Fresh Water, 12mo. &c. He died at Paris, 10th March, 1790.

ROMILLY, John, an ingenious mechanic and clock-maker, born at Geneva. He presented to Lewis XV. a watch which went a whole year without winding. He died at Paris, 16th Feb. 1796, aged 82. He wrote all the articles on clock-making in the Encyclopedie, and published besides a Letter against the Possibility of Perpetual Motion. He also established the journal de Paris, 1st Jan. 1777. His son John Edme, was a Calvinistic minister at Geneva and London, and published 3 volumes of Discourses. He was the friend of d'Alembert, Voltaire, and J. J. Rousseau, and died 1779.

ROMNEY, George, an eminent painter, born of obscure parents in Lancashire. He, from his youth, devoted himself to painting, which he improved under the care of an itinerant painter. When he first came to London, he presented his death of general Wolfe to the public, and it not only obtained the second prize of the exhibition, but ensured him public notice, with a handsome price. Eager to improve himself, he determined to visit Italy by means of the little property which he had already saved by his pencil, and on his return from the continent, he was received with the distinction due to an able and ingenious artist. His portraits were much admired, and his historical pieces also possessed great merit. He died at Kendal in 1802.

ROMULUS, son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, laid the foundations of Rome, 753 B. C. and died after a reign of 38 years.

RONCALLI, Christofano, called also Pomeraneo, from the place of his birth, excelled as an historical painter. He was the pupil of Circignano, and died 1626.

RONDELET, William, a native of Montpellier, who studied anatomy with great success, and acquired celebrity lebrity as a physician. He wrote a Latin treatise on Fishes, 2 vols. folio — and various tracts on medicine, published, 8vo. 1628. He died at Realmont, 18th July 1566, aged 59, in consequence of eating figs to excess.

RONCARD, Peter de, a French poet, of a noble family, born at Vendomois, 1524. He studied at Paris, and became page to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards was for two years in the service of James V. of Scotland. On his return to France, he was engaged in negotiations, and at the same time devoted much of his time to literature and poetry. He was the favorite of Henry II. of France, and his four successors, and though a layman, obtained some ecclesiastical dignities in commendam, especially St. Cosmas priory, near Tours, where he died 1585. His poetry was much admired in France, so that he obtained in that age the honorable appellation of the poet of France. His genius was certainly great, and his conceptions sublime, yet he was deficient in judgment. His works consist of hymns, odes, elegies, sonnets, &c. but in his amorous poetry he does not always adhere to that delicacy of expression which virtue approves.

RONSIN, Charles Philip, a native of Soissons. The French revolution opened a scene for the display of the impetuous passions and bold designs of his character, and by the influence of his friends Danton and Marat, he was soon promoted to the office of war minister, and then to the command of the revolutionary army. In La Vendée, and at Meaux his steps were traced by all the horrors of open murder and secret assassination; but on his return to Paris, he was soon marked for destruction when he attempted to raise the power of the communes above the convention. He was guillotined 24th March 1794, aged 42, and met death with an undaunted countenance. He was the author of some tragedies, Lewis XII. — Areanphile, &c. which, though acted, possess not much merit.

ROODSEUS, John Albert, a native of Hoorn in Holland, eminent as a portrait painter, whose pieces were highly finished and delicately colored. He died 1674, aged 59.

ROOKE, sir George, a brave admiral, born of a respectable family in Kent, 1650. He was educated for a learned profession, but his father yielded at last to his wish to serve in the navy, and in this favorite employment, he soon distinguished himself. His most glorious exploits were in saving the Smyrna fleet from a French squadron, in taking the almost impregnable fortress of Gibraltar, 1703, in destroying the French ships at the battle of la Hogue, in the affair of Malaga, and at the glorious action before Vigo. His brilliant services, though acknowledged with gratitude by William, were disregarded by the Whig party, which swayed the kingdom in Anne's reign, and the gallant admiral, because he voted in the House of Commons against the ministry, was considered as no longer fit to serve his country, and retired, neglected, to his seat in Kent, where he died 24th Jan. 1708-9. He was buried in Canterbury cathedral. His fortune was very moderate, and he truly said, in making his will, "the little I leave was honestly gotten, never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing."

ROOKE, Laurence, an English astronomer and geometer, born at Deptford in Kent, 1623, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, from which, after taking the degree of M. A. he removed, 1650, to Wadham college, Oxford. In 1652 he was chosen astronomical professor at Gresham college, which he exchanged three years after for the chair of geometry. He was one of the first members of the Royal society, to whose formation he greatly and zealously contributed. He died at Gresham college, 1662. His works are Observations on Comets — Methods of observing Eclipses of the Moon — Observations on the Eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites — Directions to Seamen going to the Indies.

ROOME, Edward, a political writer, appointed solicitor to the treasury, 1729. He wrote some satirical papers called Pasquin, in which he abused Pope, and the offended poet in return gave him a conspicuous place in his Dunciad. He died 10th Dec. 1729, and after his death appeared "the Jovial Crew," a play, acted with some degree of success.

ROORE, James, a native of Antwerp, who distinguished himself as an historical painter, and died 1747, aged 61.

ROOS, John Hendrick, a citizen of Ottenburg, born 1631, eminent as a painter. His portraits, and particularly his landscapes, were admired. Theodore, his brother, was also a good artist, and died 1698. His son Philip, was equally celebrated; and another son, who died 1731, aged 72, also inherited the abilities of the family as a superior artist.

ROQUE, John de la, member of the academy of belles lettres at Marseilles, wrote a Voyage into Arabia Felix, 12mo. — into Palestine — into Syria and Mount Libanus, and assisted his brother Anthony in the composition of the Mercur de France. He died at Paris, 8th Dec. 1745, aged 84. Anthony, who wrote Medea and Jafon — and Theone, two tragedies, died at Paris 1744, aged 72.

ROSA, Alba Cariera, a Venetian lady, celebrated for her talents in crayon painting and miniatures. Her great correctness, delicacy, and judgment, have been long and deservedly admired. She died 1755, aged 85.

ROSA, Salvator, a painter, Vid. SALVATOR.

ROSAMOND, daughter of Walter de Clifford, lord Hereford, is celebrated in history as the fair mistress of the second Henry. To conceal this amour from his jealous queen, Henry, it is said, removed the frail beauty to a labyrinth in Woodstock park, where, however, his wife discovered her, and obliged her to take poison. Some authors declare that the fair Rosamond died at Godstow nunnery, near Oxford, and that she was buried there. She had two sons by Henry, William, furnished Longsword, and Jeffery, afterwards archbishop of York.

ROSCIUS, Quintus, a celebrated Roman actor. He was a native of Gaul, and came to Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero, and the other great great men of the age, and acquired such high celebrity as a dramatic performer, that he was allowed a public salary. He died about 61 B. C.

ROSCOMMON, Wentworth Dillon, earl of, an English poet, born in Ireland, 1633. He was brought up in England, but the commotions of the times, and the impeachment of his uncle, lord Strafford, drove him from the country to Caen, where he finished his education under the great Bochart. He afterwards travelled to Italy, and at the restoration came to England, where he was honorably received by Charles II. and made captain of the band of pensioners. He nearly ruined himself by gaming, and by the vicious indulgences prevalent at a corrupted court; but when master of horse to the duchess of York, he prudently married Frances, daughter of lord Burlington, widow of colonel Courtney, and then began to devote himself to literature and poetry, and to plan with Dryden, a design to fix and refine the English language. He died of the gout, which was improperly treated by a French empiric, 17th Jan. 1684, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His poems are few, and of those the best are, his Essay on translated Verse — and his translation of Horace's Art of Poetry. Though perhaps not a sublime poet, he certainly is a correct one, and he has the singular merit of being the only moral writer in Charles's days.

ROSEWELL, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford, and ejected in 1662 from his living of Strode for nonconformity. He afterwards became eminent among the dissenters; but in 1684 he was accused of high treason, because, in his discourse addressed to his congregation at Rotherhithe, he had spoken with contempt and ridicule of the king's pretensions to cure scrophulous disorders. On this slight accusation, he was tried and condemned, but pardoned by Charles II. He died 1691, aged 61.

ROSINUS, John, a learned German, born at Eifenac, Thuringia, 1550. He was educated at Jena, and in 1592 became preacher of the cathedral of Naumburg in Saxony, where he died of the plague, 1626. The best known of his works is, Romanorum Antiquitatum Libri decem, a most valuable composition, of which the best editions are those of Amsterdam, 1685, 4to. and of Utrecht, 1701, 4to. He wrote besides, de Præcis Romanis Gentibus, &c.

ROSOI, Barnaby Firmin du, a French writer, born at Paris, 1745. He solicited the public attention by various dramatic pieces, which, though acted with applause, possess little merit. He was also author of a romance — the Annals of Toulouse, &c. but though a voluminous writer, he yet continued poor. At the revolution he distinguished himself in favor of the unfortunate monarch, by the publication of his gazette, called l'Ami du Roi, and in consequence of the unyielding independence of his principles, he was marked for death. In his last moments he wished to benefit mankind by soliciting that his blood might be extracted from his veins, and transfused into the body of an old man, which was rejected. He was executed by the light of torches, Aug. 1792.

Ross, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, born at Aberdeen, 1640, and educated at St. Andrew's. He was, in 1686, made bishop of Edinburgh; but the revolution put an end to his power, and to the episcopal authority in Scotland. He died at Edinburgh, 1720, aged 80. He was author of some tracts now little known.

Ross, Alexander, author of Virgilius Evangelizans, a singular canto on the life of Christ, extracted all from Virgil — of View of all Religions, in 8vo. — and other tracts, was born in Aberdeen, and became master of Southampton grammar school, and chaplain to the first Charles. He died 1654, aged 64.

Ross, John, a native of Herefordshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D. D. 1756. He afterwards obtained Frome vicarage, Somersetshire, and in 1778, on the death of bishop Keppel, was preferred to the see of Exeter. He wrote a Defence of Dr. Middleton against the attacks of Mr. Markland, 1746, and in 1749 edited Cicero's Epistles ad Familiares, in 2 vols. 8vo. He published besides some single sermons, and died 1792.

ROSSI, John Victor, or JANUS NICIUS ERITHRÆUS, a Roman, of noble birth, who devoted himself totally to studious pursuits. He died 15th Nov. 1647, aged about 70. He wrote Pinacotheca Imaginum Illustr. Virorum, 8vo. — Epistolæ, 2 vols. — Dialogi, 8vo. — Exempla Virtutum & Vitiurum, 8vo. — Eudemæ Libri decem, 8vo.

ROSSI, Jerome, a learned native of Ravenna, physician to Clement VIII. He died 8th Sept. 1607. He wrote a valuable History of Ravenna — besides treatises de Distillatione Liqueurum — de Meloenibus, &c.

ROSSI, Bernard Marie de, a native of Forly, educated at Florence. He became theological professor to the Dominicans of Venice, and declined all the ecclesiastical honors offered to him. He wrote several works on historical and antiquarian subjects, the best known of which are, his Account of the Church of Aquileia. He died 1775, aged 88.

ROSSLYN, Alexander Wedderburn, earl of, an able lawyer, descended from an ancient family, and born in Scotland, 13th Feb. 1733. He was educated at Edinburgh university, and called to the Scotch bar, 1752; but he was ambitious of a wider sphere for the exertion of his abilities, and he came the next year to London, and entered at the Inner Temple. He was in 1757 called to the bar, and six years after, in consequence of his merit, he was appointed king's counsel. In parliament, where he sat as member for Richmond, he distinguished himself as an able and well-informed orator in support of Mr. George Grenville's administration, and he zealously espoused the cause of the mother country in her struggles to reduce the revolted American colonies. Mr. Wedderburn was appointed solicitor-general in 1771, attorney-general in 1778, and created, June, 1780, baron Loughborough, and made chief justice of the Common Pleas. He supported the coalition ministry, and was in 1783 made first commissioner for keeping the great seal; but was dismissed with lord North and Mr. Fox, whose opposition to the new ministry he ably seconded.

seconded in parliament. In 1793, however, he accepted the seals under Mr. Pitt's administration, and was in 1801 created earl Rosslyn, and soon after resigned the office of chancellor to retire to privacy. He died suddenly, 2d Jan. 1805, at his seat at Baylis, near Salt-hill, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. He was twice married; by his first wife he had no issue, and by the second, sister of the late lord Courtenay, whom he married 1782, he had a son, who died an infant. As he left no issue, he obtained the grant of his earldom to his relation, sir James St. Clair Erskine. As a lawyer and a judge, lord Rosslyn supported a most respectable character; he proved himself on the bench the friend of the seamen, whose rights had been invaded by their commanders; but he was censured by some for arbitrarily placing at the trial of the Southwark rioters, in one indictment, men who were strangers to each other, and who thus were deprived of the privileges afforded by the law even to the greatest criminals. He was author of a pamphlet, called "Observations on the State of the English Prisons, and the Means of Improving them," a work of merit, and dictated by the purest humanity.

Rosso, Le, or MASTER ROUX, a native of Florence, who, by studying the works of Michael Angelo and Parmesan, acquired celebrity as a painter, even without the assistance of a master. Francis I. appointed him superintendant of works at Fontainebleau, and rewarded his attention and services by a canonry of the holy chapel. He was so much affected by the tortures which were inflicted on his friend Pellegrin, whom he had accused falsely of robbing him of a sum of money, that in a melancholy moment of reflection, he took poison and soon after died, 1541, aged 45. His heads of old men, and his female figures were much admired.

ROTARI, Peter, a native of Verona, who acquired great celebrity as a portrait and historical painter. He was in 1756 at Petersburg, where he was patronized by the court, and took the portraits of the imperial family, and of the nobility, and he afterwards returned to Italy. The year of his death is not ascertained.

ROTGANS, Luke, a native of Amsterdam, who engaged in the wars of Holland in 1672, but after two years' service, retired to his country seat, where he devoted himself to poetry. His epic poem, in eight books, on the Life of William III. is held in high estimation by the Dutch. He wrote also other poems, and shares with Vondel and Antonides the honor of being at the head of the bards of Holland. He died of the small-pox, 3d Nov. 1710, aged 66.

ROTHENAMER, John, a native of Munich, eminent as a painter, and as the successful imitator of Tintoret. His historical pieces possessed merit, and he was liberally patronized by the emperor Rodolph II. He died 1604, aged 40.

ROTHERAM, John, a native of Yorkshire, who studied physic and took his medical degrees at Edinburgh. He published a Philosophical Enquiry into the Nature and Properties of Water, and other medical works, and died 1787.

ROTHERAM, John, author of an Apology for the Athanasian Creed—Essay on the Truth of Christianity—Discourse on Faith, and its Connection with good Works, 8vo. and other religious tracts, was rector of Houghton-le-Spring, Durham, and died 1788.

ROTHMAN, Christopher, author of a treatise on Comets, and letters on Astronomy, addressed to Tycho Brahe, was astronomer to the landgrave of Hesse, and died 1592.

ROTRON, John de, a native of Dreux, distinguished as a poet, and as a magistrate. While an epidemic disorder raged in Dreux, and all fled for safety, the humane Rotron remained to administer to the necessities of the poor; and in answer to his brother, who earnestly solicited his departure, he said, "the bells are tolling for the 22d person who has died this day, and how soon soever they may announce my departure, I know not, but I will not desert my post." Soon after the contagion carried him off, 28th June, 1650, in his 41st year. He was patronized by Richelieu, but never would condescend, to please his patron, to attack the Cid of Corneille, a poet whom he revered and loved. He wrote 37 plays, tragedies, and comedies, with vigor, spirit, and success, of which the best known are Chlores, Antigone, and Wenceslaus, tragedies.

ROUBILLAC, Francis, a native of Switzerland, eminent for his beautiful statuary. He was engaged in finishing some of the most splendid of the monuments erected in Westminster abbey, and died 1762, in London, where he had been for some time settled.

ROUCHER, J. A. a native of Montpellier, distinguished as a poet. He hailed the approach of the French revolution as an era which was to bless the earth; but when he beheld its atrocities, he spoke with freedom against the tyrants whose violent measures deluged the kingdom with blood. His observations drew down upon him the resentment of the revolutionary tribunal, and he was guillotined July 1794, and he met death with great composure and resignation, after seeing 37 heads struck off before he suffered. His chief work is the Months, a poem in 12 cantos, which though occasionally tedious and weak, contains beautiful and animated descriptions. He also translated Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and some of his fugitive pieces appeared after his death, 2 vols. 8vo.

ROUELLE, William Francis, a native of Matthieu near Caen, who practised as an apothecary at Paris, and gave lectures in chemistry, in the royal botanical garden. He contributed some valuable things to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, and left his chemical lectures in MS. He died at Paris 3d Aug. 1770, aged 67. His brother Hilary-Marin, succeeded him as lecturer in chemistry, and died 1st April, 1779.

ROUILLE, Peter Julian, a jesuit of Tours, professor of theology and philosophy to his order. He was engaged with Catrou in the composition of the Roman History in 21 vols. 4to., and also assisted in revising the Revolutions of Spain by d'Orleans. The Journal de Trevoux, was conducted by him from 1733 to 1737. He died at Paris 17th May, 1740, aged 57.

ROUS, Francis, one of the fanatics of the commonwealth. He was of a good family in Cornwall, and represented Truro in the long parliament, and became speaker of Barebone's parliament, under Cromwell. His violent speeches against the bishops and against Armini-anism rendered him a favorite with the usurper, and he was made provost of Eton, though a lay-man. His works, which breathe the same spirit of enthusiasm, virulence, and bigotry, which he every where exhibited, appeared fol. 1657. He died 1659. He was called in ridicule, the illiterate Jew of Eton.

ROUSE, John, author of the Antiquities of Warwick—a Chronicle of the Kings of England—a History of the two Universities, was a native of Warwick, and died there 1491.

ROUSSEAU, John Baptist, an eminent French poet, born at Paris 1669. Though his father was a shoemaker, yet he received a decent education, and early displayed a strong and correct taste for poetry. In 1688, he went as page in the embassy to Denmark, and from thence passed with marshal Tallard, as his secretary to the English court. Distinction in literature, and not in opulence, was his chief aim, and therefore he refused about this time some honorable appointments which would have set him above dependance, and was better pleased to be enrolled member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres. About this time some satirical verses, very severe and grossly abusive, were produced as his own, and though he solemnly declared his innocence, and pronounced them forgeries invented by his enemies, he was tried by the parliament and banished the kingdom. The sentence was harsh, as even Voltaire his personal enemy admits, and he ever after protested that the treatment he received was unjust, cruel, and illiberal. From France he came to Switzerland, where he was protected by de Luc the French ambassador, and he afterwards went to Baden, where he was noticed by prince Eugene, and with him visited Vienna. In 1721 he came to London, where he published a collection of his poems, 2 vols. 4to. and by that means found his resources respectable. He returned to Paris incognito 1739, and listened to those offers of reconciliation which his friends promised to procure for him; but soon after he was attacked by a fit of apoplexy, at the Hague, and died of that dreadful visitation at Brussels, 17th March, 1741. His poems consisting of odes, epigrams, epistles, comedies in verse, &c. have been published in 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 12mo. 1743. His poetry, particularly his odes, in Voltaire's opinion, are beautiful, diversified and abound with images. In his private character he was overbearing and unsubmitive; he quarrelled with his patron prince Eugene, and with the same levity and rudeness affronted the duke of Artemberg, who had kindly and liberally noticed him.

ROUSSEAU, James, a French painter born at Paris 1630. He studied in Italy, and was patronized by Lewis XIV. but as he was a protestant, he left his country to avoid persecution. He next went to Holland, and afterwards visited England where he was employed by the duke of Montague. His landscapes and architectural representations are much admired. He died in London 1693.

ROUSSEAU, John James, a celebrated philosopher, born 28th June, 1712, at Geneva, where his father was a watch-maker. His mother died in bringing him into the world, and his birth, as he observes, was the first of his misfortunes. Though of a weakly constitution, his mind was strong and active, and the reading of Plutarch and Tacitus, which adorned the shelves of his father's shop, opened his ideas, and inspired him with courage. Some juvenile frolick induced him to quit his father's house, and without protectors he changed his religion to procure bread. By the care of the bishop of Anneci, in whose house he solicited an asylum, he was placed with Mad. de Warens, a lady who had lately abandoned the protestant for the catholic tenets, and devoted part of her fortune to deeds of charity. Rousseau some time after quitted the hospitable roof of this amiable female, who had been to him a mother and a friend, and as he was fond of music he began to teach it at Chamberri. From Chamberri he came, in 1741, to Paris, and two years after went as secretary with Montague, the French ambassador, to Venice; but his proud and restless spirit could not long bear the confinement of servitude, and in consequence of a quarrel with his employer, he returned to Paris. Here he was noticed by Dupin, the farmer general, who gave him an office in his department, and at last, in 1750, he began his literary career, and obtained the prize of the academy of Dijon, on the subject, whether the re-establishment of the arts and sciences has been conducive to the purity of morals? He adopted, by the advice of his friend Diderot, the negative position, and defended it with such eloquence and success, that he excited a number of literary antagonists against him. He next attracted the public attention by his discourse on the causes of inequality among men, and on the origin of society, a work of singular character, and which unites the boldest flights of imagination, with the most incoherent ideas, and elevates savage nature above the comforts of domestic and social life. This composition dedicated in animated language to the republic of Geneva, restored him to the favor of his native country, and to the bosom of the protestant faith. After returning for a while to Paris, he retired to solitude, and devoted himself to study. His letter to d'Alembert, written about this time, and published in 1758, on the subject of establishing a theatre at Geneva, drew upon him the censures and the persecution of Voltaire, and it was remarked with surprize that this bold advocate for the purity of morals against the contagion of theatrical representation had himself written a comedy, and a pastoral, which had been exhibited on the Paris stage. His next work was the Dictionary of Music, which contains many valuable articles, but not without inaccuracies. His New Heloise appeared in 1761 in 6 vols. 12mo. and, notwithstanding its many defects, and its immorality, excited much of the public attention, for its bold delineation of character, its interesting details, and its fascinating language. Heloise was followed in 1762 by Emilius in 4 vols. 12mo. a moral romance still of greater celebrity. In this popular work the philosopher wishes to leave in education every thing to nature, and whilst he inveighs in warm language against the luxuries, the vices, and the prejudices of the age, he speaks truths worthy of Plato and of Tacitus. It is, however, much to be lamented that in tracing out the education of a young man, and in drawing a most affecting picture of the benign author of christianity, and of the sublime beauties beauties of the gospel, he attacks with blind misguided fury the miracles and the prophecies on which that divine revelation rests, and builds his system of salvation on reason and natural religion. The book, though popular, was exposed to the censures and condemnation of the parliament of Paris, and the author hastened out of France. He sought an asylum at Geneva, but the gates of the city were shut against the disgraced philosopher, and he retired to Neufchatel in Switzerland, where he began to write a defence of his works, and of his principles. Here, however, the populace was roused to acts of violence, by the pulpit discourses of the ministers of the neighbourhood, and therefore fearing greater insults than the pelting of his windows, he fled from Neufchatel. Berne, where he sought an asylum, was shut against him, and he therefore hastened to Strasbourg, where the marshal de Contades relieved his necessities, and enabled him to proceed to Paris, in which place he expected the protection of David Hume. With the English philosopher he travelled to London, and found in this country a peaceful residence; but whilst he fled from persecution the citizen of Geneva still longed for celebrity. In England he was a common man, and not the favorite of the people, admired and applauded, and therefore he soon quarrelled with his protector, Hume, and left the kingdom in disgust. He passed through Amiens and returned to Paris, where he was permitted to remain, provided he wrote nothing offensive against religion or the government. Ever restless and suspicious he now appeared in the Armenian dress, and when flattered by the homage of those who revered his abilities, he declared himself insulted, and began to interpret the approbation of the world as a regular system of persecution excited against him by men of letters. The last years of his life were spent in the company of a few friends, and while he seemed to condemn the fallacy of former opinions, he resigned himself to the peaceful studies and solitude of declining age. He died of an apoplexy at Ermenonville, the estate of M. de Girardin, 30 miles from Paris, 2d July 1778, aged 66; and in the isle of Poplars, in this beautiful retreat, are inscribed these words: "Ici repose l'homme de la nature & de la verité! Vitam impendere vero." Rousseau, who may be called the Diogenes of modern times, married in 1769, at Bourgoin in Dauphiné, a woman of the name of le Vasseur, who, without elegance of manners, and without mental attainments, exercised over him the most absolute dominion. She, however, gave him in return all the attentions of a nurse and of a friend, and accompanied him in all his wanderings at Montmorency, Geneva, Berne, Motiers, Neufchatel, London, Brienne, Bourgoin, Paris, and Ermenonville. The works of this singular character have been collected in 33 vols. 8vo. and 12mo. His Confessions were published after his death. His "Pensées" have appeared in a separate form, and are valuable, as they exhibit much of the original character of the man, and the most sublime truths of morality and of religion, without the prejudices, the passions, and the absurdities of the misanthrope.

ROUSSEL, William, a Benedictine of Conches in Normandy. He devoted himself to literary pursuits at Rheims, and died at Argenteuil, 5th Oct. 1717, aged 59. He ably translated St. Jerome's Letters, 3 vols. 8vo. and began a literary history of France, which was finished by Rivet.

ROUSSEL, Peter, a native of Ax in Pamiers, who took his medical degrees at Montpellier, and was the pupil of the great Bordeu. He published Système Physique & Moral de la Femme, 12mo. a work of great merit, and began a work on the same subject on man. He died at Chateaudun, 1803, aged 60, and his euloge was pronounced by his friend Bordeu.

Roux, Augustin, a native of Gascony, who studied medicine, and took his degrees at Bourdeaux. He published a treatise on Purifying Liquors — Memoirs of Chemistry — Typographical Annals — New portable Encyclopedie, 2 vols. 8vo. — and also continued Vandermonde's Journal of Medicine. He died 1776, aged 50.

Rowe, Nicolas, an eminent English poet, born at Little Beckford, Bedfordshire, 1673. From Highgate school he went to Westminster, under the tuition of the great Busby, and at the age of 16 removed to the Middle Temple. Though his abilities might have raised him to eminence in the law, yet he preferred literature to all other pursuits, and at the age of 25 he produced his first tragedy "the Ambitious Stepmother," which was received with universal applause. Tamerlane — the Fair Penitent — Ulysses — the Royal Convert — Jane Shore — and Lady Jane Grey, succeeded, and with equal approbation; but the poet found his powers inadequate to the ease and sprightliness of comedy, and his "Biter," was so little popular that it is not even inserted in his works. His literary fame made him known to the great, the duke of Queensbury, when secretary of state made him his public secretary, and on the Hanoverian succession he was appointed poet laureat, and land surveyor of the customs of the port of London, and afterwards chancellor Parker's secretary to the presentations, and clerk to the prince of Wales' council. He died 6th Dec. 1718, aged 45, and was interred in Westminster abbey, lamented not only by Pope's muse, but by many characters of merit and virtue, by whom he was highly esteemed. He translated into verse Lucan's Pharsalia, and Quillet's Callipædia, and edited Shakespeare's plays, with an account of his life. Rowe is still a popular poet on the stage, and his Jane Shore, as Johnson says, is always seen and heard with pity. Though he does not often excite terror, yet he elevates the sentiments, and though he seldom pierces the breast, he always delights the ear, and often improves the understanding.

Rowe, Elizabeth, an English lady, known for her genius and virtues, daughter of Mr. Singer, a dissenting minister, and born at Ilchester, 11th Sep. 1674. She early displayed a poetical genius, and in her 22d year were published some of her poems under the title of poems on several occasions by Philomela. Her talents and virtues rendered her soon a favorite with the public, and among her respectable suitors she had the poet Prior; but she disregarded all applications till 1710, when she gave her hand to Mr. Thomas Rowe, a gentleman tleman already known for his literary acquirements. After his death, which happened 1715, and which he recorded in one of her best elegies, she lived in retirement at Frome, in the cultivation of the muses. She died of an apoplexy, 20th Feb. 1736-7. After her death, agreeable to her request, her devotions were published by Dr. Watts, under the title of Devout Exercises of the Heart, &c. and in 1739, appeared her miscellaneous works in prose and verse, 2 vols. 8vo. These works contain the History of Joseph, a poem — Friendship in Death — Letters Moral, &c. and enforce by the strongest conviction and the most interesting examples, the love of virtue and the practice of every good and benevolent action.

ROWE, Thomas, the husband of the preceding, was son of Benoni Rowe a dissenting minister. He was born in London, and educated at the Charter-house, and at Leyden university. In 1710, two years after his return from the continent, he married Miss Singer, with whom he lived for five years in the enjoyment of every domestic comfort, till a lingering illness put an end to his life, May 1718, in his 28th year. Among other things he wrote an ode to his wife, some time after his marriage, under the title of Delia, a proof of his love, and of her many virtues. He also undertook to give a translation of Plutarch's Lives, but finished only eight.

ROWE, Thomas, a native of Petherwin, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He became minister of Litchet, Dorsetshire, but was ejected in 1662, for nonconformity, and afterwards took the care of a dissenting congregation at Wimborn, where he died 1698. He was author of the Christian's Work, &c.

ROWE, John, an English divine, born at Crediton, Devonshire, and educated at New Inn hall, Oxford. He was for some time a popular minister at Witney, Oxfordshire, and then removed to Tiverton, in his native county, and in 1654, settled as preacher in Westminster abbey, from which he was ejected 1662, for nonconformity. He died 12th Oct. 1677, and was buried in Bunhill fields. His "Love of Christ," in 30 sermons, are a much esteemed publication. He wrote besides some practical treatises.

ROWLAND, Henry, a native of Anglesey, known for a valuable and interesting history of his native island, called Mona Restaurata in 4to. He was in orders, and died 1722.

ROWLEY, a monk of Bristol, said to have flourished in the 15th century. Some particulars of his writings either real or fictitious are mentioned under Chatterton.

ROWLEY, William, a dramatic writer, in the reign of the first Charles, educated at Cambridge. He was the friend of the learned of his own times, and is spoken of with great commendation by Wood. He left five plays, in one of which he was assisted by Shakespeare.

ROWLEY, Samuel, a dramatic writer in Charles the first's reign, but of no great celebrity. Two historical plays by him are mentioned, but with little commendation.

ROWLEY, William, an eminent physician, descended from an Irish family, born in London, 18th Nov. 1743. After applying himself to the medical profession, he served in the army and was at the siege of Belleisle, and at the taking of the Havannah, and his conduct was so meritorious that he was employed by the ministry under the patronage of lord Keppel to make professional visits to Cuba, and all the Leeward islands, for which he was honorably rewarded. He settled afterwards in London, and acquired an extensive practice, but though he was honored with a doctor's degree from St. Andrew's, and had been admitted bachelor of medicine from St. Alban's hall, Oxford; some objections were made in that university to his obtaining the next degree, and he never took it. His publications were respectable in number, and all on medical subjects. Though a man of great observation and of extensive experience, it is remarkable that either from the love of singularity, or from prejudice, he opposed the vaccine inoculation, and thus impeded by the weight of his authority the adoption of a system which bids fair to extirpate one of the greatest scourges of the human race. This excellent man, whose humanity and benevolence were as conspicuous as his medical reputation was extensive, died 17th March, 1806, and was privately buried in St. James's chapel, Tottenham-court road.

ROWNING, John, an able mathematician, fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards rector of Anderby, Lincolnshire. He died in Carey street, London, Nov. 1771, aged 72. His compendious system of natural philosophy, 2 vols. 8vo. is a popular work and has often been reprinted, and was once a standing class book at Cambridge.

ROXANA, a Persian lady of great beauty, whom Alexander took for his wife, and at his death left pregnant. Her son Alexander, was cruelly murdered by Cassander, and she shared his fate.

ROY, Julian le, a native of Tours, who from his earliest years showed great mechanical knowledge. He came to Paris at the age of 18, and in 1713, was admitted into the society of clock makers. He raised his profession to the highest pitch of excellence, and his watches acquired the same celebrity in France, as those of Graham in England. He died at Paris, 20th Sep. 1759, aged 74, leaving four sons. Peter the eldest was watch maker to the king, and published Memoirs for the Clock Makers of Paris, 4to. — Etrennes Chronometriques — treatise on the Labors of Harrison and le Roy for the Discovery of Longitude at Sea, 4to. — Letter to M. de Marivetz. He died 1785. Julian David another son, was member of the national institute, and became professor of architecture. He travelled over Greece and other countries, and published Ruins of the Finest Monuments of Greece, fol. a work of merit — History of the Construction of Christian Temples, 8vo. — Observations on the Edifices of the Antients — on the Marine, Ships, Sails, &c. of the Antients. He died of an apoplexy at the end of Jan. 1803, aged 75.

ROYSE, George, D. D. an English divine, born at Martock, Somersetshire, 1655, and educated at Edmund mund hall, Oxford. He became fellow of Oriel college, and was afterwards chaplain to king William, and to Tillotson the primate, who gave him Newington rectory, Oxfordshire. He was elected provost of Oriel 1690, and afterwards was made dean of Bristol, and died April, 1708.

ROYSE, John, A. M. a popular preacher under Cromwell, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was ejected in 1662, and died the next year. His "Spirit's Touch Stone," is admired.

ROZE'E, N. a native of Leyden. She excelled in the use of the pencil, but in the finishing of her pictures she applied, instead of colors, silk floss on the ground, which she disposed with the highest effect, and with the most correct taste. Her landscapes, portraits, and historical pieces, all finished in this delicate manner, are much admired. She died 1682, aged 50.

ROZIER, Francis, an eminent agriculturist, born at Lyons, 24th Jan. 1734. Though he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became doctor in divinity, and prior of Nanteuil, he devoted himself deeply to the study of his favorite science, and to botany, chemistry, and natural history. At Paris, he was noticed by the great and the powerful, but he sought for retirement at Bezieres, where he composed and finished his valuable course of agriculture in 10 vols. 4to. In 1788, he returned to Lyons, where the academy admitted him among its most honorable members. During the revolution he showed himself firm and moderate, but when Lyons was besieged a bomb fell on his bed while he was asleep, and buried his shattered limbs among the ruins of the house, 20th Sep. 1793. He wrote besides Memoirs on making Wine — on Mills and Presses, and other useful works on agricultural and commercial subjects.

RUBENS, for Peter Paul, a celebrated painter, born at Cologne, 1577. He studied at Antwerp, from which for a time the civil wars had driven his family; but while he applied to the belles lettres, he displayed a strong partiality for the art of designing. This taste was happily promoted, and after receiving instruction from the best Flemish masters he went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself, especially by studying accurately the coloring of Titian, and all the striking beauties of Julio Romano, of Raphael and other illustrious painters. After an absence of seven years spent in viewing the cabinets of Italy he returned to Antwerp, where he took a wife, whom after four years of domestic happiness he lost. He afterwards took a second wife of great beauty, whose personal charms it is said, he transfused into his paintings. The fame of his great talents was soon spread over Europe, and he was deservedly courted by great men and princes. He was invited to Paris by Mary de Medicis to paint the Luxemburg gallery, and he became such a favorite with the infantia Isabella of Spain, that she sent him as her ambassador to England to negotiate a peace in 1630. During his residence in England, he painted the Banqueting house, and was much noticed by Buckingham, and also by Charles I. who knighted him. On his return to Spain he was honorably received by Philip IV. and made secretary of state in Flanders.

He died 1640, leaving an immense fortune behind him. His eldest son Albert succeeded him as secretary in Flanders. Rubens was deservedly held in high esteem, and it is said, that few persons passed through Flanders without seeing a man of whose talents and great reputation they had heard so much. Of his many pupils Vandyke acquired the greatest celebrity.

RUBENS, Albert, son of the above, was born at Antwerp, 1614, and gained the esteem of the archduke Leopold William, governor of the Low Countries, by his virtues and intelligence. He wrote de Re Vestitiarâ Veterum, præcipue de Lato Clavo — Diatribæ de Gemmâ Tiberianâ, Augustæ, &c. — Regum & Imperatorum Roman. Numismata, fol. — de Vitâ Flavii Manlii Theodori, 12mo. He died 1657.

RUCCELLAI, John, a native of Florence, of illustrious birth. He embraced the ecclesiastical state, and was sent by Leo X. his relation, as ambassador to Francis I. but the death of that pope cut off his hopes of obtaining the purple, though the next pontiff, Clement VII. appointed him governor of St. Angelo. He died in obscurity about 1526, aged 50. He wrote Rosamonde, and Orestes, tragedies, and the Bees, a poem of merit in blank verse, translated into French by Pingeron.

RUCCELLAI, Bernard, a native of Florence in the 15th century, author of Bellum Italicum, printed, London, 1733, in 4to. &c. Another of the same family who embraced the ecclesiastical profession and obtained considerable benefices from the pope. His intimacy with the pope raised him enemies, and he left Italy and retired to France where he lived in the most effeminate and sumptuous manner. He died at Montpellier, 22d Oct. 1622.

RUDBECK, Olaus, professor of medicine at Upsal, wrote Exercitatio Anatomica, 4to. — Atlantica, five Manheim Vera Japheti Posterorum Sedes ac Patera, 3 vols. fol. with an Atlas — Leges West-Gothicæ, fol. — Collection of Plants on Plates, 2 vols. fol. — Lapponia Illustrata, et iter per Upland. 4to. — Dissertation on the Bird called Selai in the Bible, &c. He died 1702, aged 73. His son of the same name was also an eminent physician, and published Dissertatio de Hederâ — a Catalogue of the Plants of Lapland — Specimen Lingvæ Gothicæ, 4to.

RUDDIMAN, Thomas, a learned Scotchman, born in Aberdeenshire, 1684, and educated at Aberdeen. He was made overseer of the king's printing house, Edinburgh, and for near 50 years continued keeper of the advocates' library there, and distinguished himself for the many valuable books which he edited. He was strongly attached to the Stewart family, and therefore opposed the revolution. His Diplomata et Numismata Scotiæ, are admired, but particularly his excellent Latin grammar, with valuable notes. He died at Edinburgh 1757, aged 84.

RUE, Charles de la, a French orator and poet, born at Paris 1643. He was educated among the jesuits, and distinguished himself as a professor of belles lettres and rhetoric, and as an eloquent preacher. He published in 1667, the Conquests of Lewis XIV. a Latin poem, which Corneille translated into French, with many high commencommendations of the original author. He was among the editors of the Dauphin classics, and published Virgil. He wrote also tragedies in Latin and French, which possessed great merit, besides 3 vols. of sermons, and died 1725, aged 82.

RUE, Charles de la, a Benedictine monk, born 1685. He was very learned in Greek and Hebrew, and became the friend and associate of Montfaucon, and by his advice published the works of Origen, in 3 vols. fol. He died 1739.

RUFFHEAD, Owen, an English writer. He published the life of Pope—a collection of statutes at large—and other works, and died 1769.

RUFFI, Anthony de, a learned counsellor of Marseilles. He is author of an History of Marseilles, 2 vols. fol. which was continued by his son Louis Anthony. He wrote besides, the History of the Generals of the Gallies, &c. He died 1689, aged 82, and his son 1724, aged 67.

RUFINUS, a father of the church. He was born at Aquileia, and was the friend and afterwards the antagonist of St. Jerome. He died in Sicily 410. Besides a Latin translation of Josephus, and of some of the works of Origen, he wrote the lives of some of the fathers of the desert, &c.

RUFUS, Ephesus, an ancient Greek anatomical writer in Trajan's reign. He was considered as an able physician, but his works have all perished, and only the Greek names of the parts of the body are preserved from his writings. He wrote treatises on the Diseases of the Reins and Bladder—on the Bile, &c.

RUGENDAS, George Philip, a native of Augsburg, celebrated as a painter. He painted with his left hand. He chiefly excelled in the representation of battles, sieges, and in historical pieces, and died 1742, aged 76.

RUGGLE, George, an English writer, fellow of Clare hall, Cambridge. He wrote Ignoramus, a Latin comedy of some merit, performed with great applause in the university before James I. 1614. He died about 1640.

RUHNKEIUS, David, a native of Stolp in Pomerania, who became professor of belles lettres and history, and librarian, in Leyden university. He died 14th May, 1798, aged 75. He wrote Epistolæ Criticæ in Hæliodi & Homeri Hymnos—de Vitâ et Scriptis Longini—Timæi Sophistæ Lexicon—Historia Critica Oratorum Græcorum, 2 vols. 8vo.—Editions of V. Paternulus, Rutilius Lupus, &c. The life of this able and learned critic has been published by Wytenbach.

RUINART, Thierry, a Benedictine monk, born at Rheims, 1657. He was an able theologian, and was the associate of Mabillon, in his literary labors. He was author of the Acts of the Martyrs of the Four first Centuries, 4to.—History of the Persecution of the Vandals, 4to.—the Life of Mabillon—the Life of Pope Urban V. besides an edition of Gregory of Tours. He died 1709.

RULE, Gilbert, a native of Elgin, educated at Aberdeen, where he became professor of philosophy. He was, in 1659, made principal of his college; but he was ejected two years after for nonconformity, after which he went to Leyden, and took his degrees in medicine. At the revolution he was appointed principal of the university of Edinburgh, and died there 1705, aged 77. He wrote some pieces in defence of his nonconformity, and against episcopacy, of little merit. Some specimens of his pulpit oratory are preserved in the Scotch presbyterian eloquence.

RULHIÈRES, N. de, a learned Frenchman, secretary to the French ambassador l'Hôpital in Russia, when Peter III. was hurled from his throne. He published a short but very interesting account of this extraordinary event, and afterwards gave an history of the revolution in Poland. He was preparing an account of the French revolution, when he died suddenly, 30th Jan. 1791. He wrote besides a pamphlet of great merit, on the Protestants of France, and two poems on Disputes—les Jeux des Mains. Two volumes of his posthumous works appeared 12mo. 1791.

RULLAND, Martin, a physician of Freisingen in Bavaria, professor of medicine at Lawingen in Swabia, and physician to Rodolphus II. He wrote Medica Practica—Appendix de Dosibus, &c.—Thesaurus Rulandinus—Lexicon Alchymicæ—Hydriatica, or a treatise on Mineral Waters. He died at Prague 1602, aged 70. His son Martin was born at Lawingen, and became physician to the emperor, and died at Prague 1611, aged 52. He wrote some medical tracts.

RUMPHIUS, George Everard, doctor of medicine in Hanau university, became consul at Amboyna, and paid there particular attention to botanical pursuits. Though he had the misfortune to lose his sight at the age of 43, he yet followed his favorite studies, and by the delicate powers of his taste and of his smell, he still distinguished all the varieties of plants. His learned labors were presented to the public in 1755, with a supplement by John Burmann, in 6 vols. fol. He published besides, Imagines Piscium Testaceorum, fol. 1711, and Political History of Amboyna.

RUNDLE, Thomas, a learned prelate, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL. D. 1723. The friendship of lord Talbot, to whom he was chaplain, procured him preferment, and he became archdeacon of Wilts, treasurer of Sarum, rector of Sedgely, and prebendary of Durham, which he exchanged in 1735, for the see of Derry. He was the intimate friend of the learned and of the polite in his age. A volume of his letters has been printed. He died 1743.

RUPERT, Prince, son of Frederic king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth daughter of James I. visited England at the beginning of the civil wars, and as he had acquired some military knowledge abroad, he was entrusted by Charles with the command of some of his armies, and behaved with spirit and address. Under the second Charles he was placed at the head of the navy, and defeated the Dutch fleet in 1673. In the midst of his military engagements he paid particular attention to the arts and sciences, he was fond of chemistry, and from the accidental observation of a soldier scraping his rusty gun he invented mezzotinto printing, of which he himself executed the first specimen, still to be seen in Evelyn Sculptura, first edition. This gallant prince died 1682.

RUREMONDE, John William de, a French fanatic. He believed himself to be inspired in 1580, and commissioned by heaven to restore the tenets of the anabaptists of Munster, and for a while he collected adherents around him, by encouraging them to pillage the rich, whose property he regarded as common to the disciples of Christ, and by permitting them polygamy. He was at last seized, and by order of the duke of Cleves condemned to be burnt by a slow fire. He suffered the punishment with astonishing fortitude, and two of his wives imitating his example shared his fate with the same obstinate indifference.

RUSCELLI, Jerome, a native of Viterbo, educated at Venice. He was eminent for his learning, and published Rimario, or a dictionary of Rhymes—Imprese Illustri, or Illustrious Coats of Arms, &c. and died at Rome 1565.

RUSHWORTH, John, a learned Englishman, born in Northumberland 1607, and educated at Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar. He was very expert as a short hand writer, and in consequence of his great dexterity was employed to minute down the particulars of the most important debates and causes in parliament, and in the courts of justice. He was in 1640, appointed joint clerk to the house of commons, and afterwards attended his relation general Fairfax as his secretary. In 1658, he was chosen member for Berwick, and also in 1660, and 1678, and the next year, and he recommended himself to the king's favor, by presenting to him some valuable records of the privy council, which he had preserved during the civil wars. Either through extravagance or carelessness, he was imprisoned in the king's bench, and died there after six years' confinement, 12th May, 1690. His historical collections of private passages in state, &c. appeared at various times in 7 vols. fol. and were reprinted in 1721, with an additional volume. The work is generally considered as too favorable to the republican party, and thence he was accused of untruths, and of libelling the government, by Dr. John Nalson of Cambridge, who published in opposition, a collection of the affairs of state, &c.

RUSSEL, Alexander, physician to the English factory at Aleppo, was born and educated at Edinburgh. During his residence in Turkey, he applied himself to acquire the knowledge of the language, and gained great celebrity by his medical abilities, which procured him the patronage and friendship of the pacha of Aleppo. He returned to Europe in 1759, and was elected physician of St. Thomas's hospital, London. His history of Aleppo has been considered as a valuable performance, which has been translated into various languages. He died in London 1770.

RUSSEL, Richard, an eminent physician, author of a popular treatise on the virtues of sea water. He died 1768.

RUSSEL, lord William, third son of William, the first duke of Bedford, was born about 1641. He obtained a seat in the House of Commons under Charles II. and distinguished himself as a violent opposer of the succession of the duke of York to the throne. His conduct was regarded by the court with a jealous eye, and at last he was arrested as guilty of treasonable practices, in conjunction with the duke of Monmouth, and condemned to death. He was beheaded in Lincoln's inn fields, 21st July, 1683. After the revolution his sentence was revived, and an act passed to examine who were the authors of his death. He had married, in 1667, Rachael, second daughter of Thomas Wriotesley, earl of Southampton, widow of lord Vaughan, a woman of great merit and piety. When she heard of his condemnation, she threw herself at the king's feet, but she implored in vain; Charles was inexorable, and she immediately went to the Tower, and employed all the powers of affection and eloquence in exhorting her husband to support the dignity of his character, and to die with heroic resolution, and all the firmness of a Christian. She parted from him on the day of his execution, and he, turning from her, exclaimed, "the bitterness of death is now past." This excellent woman continued a widow till her death, 1723, at the age of 87, and she had the consolation to see her second son succeed to the honors and to the estates of the Bedford family. The letters which passed between her and her husband have been published, and display, in the strongest features, the characters of a man of upright integrity, and of a woman of the most generous heart, and the most affectionate sentiments.

RUSSEL, Elizabeth, lady, daughter of sir Anthony Cooke, married sir Thomas Hobbey, who died 1566, and afterwards lord John Russel, son and heir of Francis, the second earl of Bedford. By her second husband, who died 1584, she had one son and two daughters, Anne and Elizabeth, the last of whom was buried in Westminster abbey, where a statue on her monument seems to indicate that she died in consequence of pricking her finger with a needle. Lady Russel was a woman of a well cultivated mind, and fond of literature. She translated from the French a religious book on the Sacrament, printed, 1605. She died about 1600, aged 71.

RUST, George, a fellow of Christ college, Cambridge, who, by the friendship of Jeremy Taylor, became dean of Connor, and afterwards was raised to the see of Dromore. He died 1670, author of a discourse on Truth—a sermon, preached at the funeral of his friend bishop Taylor, and other religious pieces.

RUTH, a woman of Moab, who married Mahalon, and afterwards Boaz, by whom she had Obed, the father of Jesse, and thus became the progenitor of the royal race of David. Her history is supposed to be written by Samuel, in a simple, pleasing, chaste, and interesting style, and it forms a connection between the book of Judges, and the first of Samuel.

RUTHERFORTH, Thomas, a learned divine, born at Papworth-Everard, Cambridgeshire, 13th Oct. 1713, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards professor of divinity to the university, rector of Shenfield, Essex, and Barley, Herts, and archdeacon of Essex. He wrote a System of Natural Philosophy, 2 vols.

4to. — Institutes of Natural Law, 2 vols. 8vo. — some sermons — charges, &c. besides an Explanation of Plutarch's Description of the Instrument used to renew the Vestal fire, communicated to the Spalding Society. He died Oct. 5th, 1771.

RUTILIA, a Roman lady, the wife of M. Aur. Cotta, celebrated by Seneca, as a woman of great virtue.

RUTILIUS RUFUS, Publius, a Roman consul, banished about 105 B. C. by the knights through envy. He was honorably received wherever he went in his exile in Asia.

RUTILIUS, Claudius, a native of Toulouse, in the fifth century, who wrote a Latin Itinerary in elegiac verse. It has appeared at Amsterdam, 1687, in 12mo.

RUYSCH, Frederic, a famous Dutch anatomist, born at the Hague, 1638. He studied at Leyden and Franeker, and then settled at the Hague, which he left on an honorable invitation to become anatomical professor at Amsterdam. Here he devoted himself, with indefatigable industry, in the dissection and examination of the various parts of the human body, and made a most valuable collection of natural curiosities, which he was prevailed upon to present, for 30,000 florins, to the Czar Peter, when he visited Amsterdam, and honored the professor with his notice and esteem. His anatomical works, which are very valuable, appeared in 4 vols. 4to. He was member of the London royal society, and of the Paris academy of sciences, and died Feb. 22d, 1731, aged 93. His son Henry, who died before him, was also an able anatomist, and published Theatrum Universale omnium Animalium, &c. 2 vols. folio, 1718.

RUYSDALL, Jacob, a famous landscape painter, born at Haerlem, 1636. His banks of rivers, cascades, hilly grounds, woods, and groves, display great correctness, and all the animated beauties of nature. He died 1681. He had a brother, Solomon, equally known as a painter, though of inferior merit. He died at Haerlem, 1670.

RUYTER, Michael Adrian, a famous Dutch admiral, born at Flushing in Zealand, 1607. At the age of 11 he began his military career, and after various services, after going eight times to the West Indies, and twice to the Brazils, he was made admiral in 1641. He assisted the Portuguese against the Spaniards with great bravery, and afterwards went to the port of Salee, on the Barbary coast, where he defeated a superior force of Algerine corsairs. In 1653 he was second in command to Van Tromp in the three battles fought against the English, and two years after he displayed his valor against the Turks in the Mediterranean. His services to Denmark against the Swedes in 1659, procured to him a liberal pension from the king, and the honors of nobility. His next expedition was against the combined fleets of England and France in 1672, where he upheld his former character of bravery and intrepidity, and the next year he was engaged again in three battles with the same hostile squadrons. He was in 1676 in the Mediterranean, and in an engagement with the French fleet before Sicily, he unfortunately received a wound, which proved fatal a few days after. His death was lamented not only by his nation, but even Lewis XIV. expressed his sorrow at the fate of a man who had carried personal bravery and cool presence of mind to so high a pitch.

RYAN, Lacy, a dramatic writer, born at Westminster about 1694. His friends intended him for the law, but the stage had greater attractions, and he was the first who performed the character of Marcus in Addison's Cato, which he gave with spirit and effect, though only 18 years old. He grew into public favor, and though a very respectable actor, he never was considered as a first rate performer, as the cadence of his voice was unfortunately and disagreeably too shrill to please the ear. His intimacy with Quin reflects honor on both, and it was remarked with pleasure, that the aged veteran stepped forth with alacrity to perform his favorite Falstaff, for the benefit of his friend. Mr. Ryan died 15th Aug. 1760, aged 68, at Bath, where he had retired for his health.

RYCKHAERT, Martin, a native of Antwerp, esteemed as a landscape painter. He was the friend of Vandyck, and other eminent artists, and died 1636, aged 45. — There lived also in his age, in the same place, and of the same name, David, who was eminent as a painter of rural scenery.

RYCKIUS, Theodore, professor of history at Leyden, published editions of Tacitus, 2 vols. 12mo. — and of Stephanus Byzantius, folio, &c. He died 1690.

RYCQUIUS, Justus, a native of Ghent, who travelled into Italy, and was honored with the title of citizen of Rome, in consequence of his writings. He was made by Urban VIII. professor of eloquence at Bologna, where he died 1627. His work de Capitolio Romano, 1617, 4to. is a valuable composition, which was again edited at Leyden, by J. Gronovius, with learned notes.

RYER, Peter du, a dramatic writer, born at Paris, 1605. He was in 1626 appointed secretary to Lewis XIII. but in consequence of an imprudent marriage, and of attendant poverty, sold the place. He was afterwards secretary to the duke of Vendome, and was made member of the French academy, and also historiographer of France, with a pension. He wrote 19 dramatic pieces, and translated 13, which, according to Voltaire, were popular on the stage. He died 1658.

RYLAND, John, author of the Christian Student and Pastor — the Preceptor — Elements of Mechanics — sermons — and some controversial tracts, was a baptist preacher at Northampton. To increase his income, he kept for some years an academy, and died at Enfield, 1792. As his reputation was extensive among people of his persuasion, he received the honorary degree of M. A. from Edinburgh university, and as a literary character, he was flattered by the friendship and correspondence of Dr. Johnson, Doddridge, Hervey, and other learned men.

RYLAND, William Wynne, an unfortunate man, son of a London copper-plate printer. He learnt engraving under Ravenat, and afterwards visited Italy and France, where he greatly improved his talents. His copper plates, to yield impressions with all the softness of chalk drawing, were so popular, that he obtained the place of engraver to the king, with a pension of 300*l.* per annum. His connection with a printfeller of Cornhill, afterwards embarrassed his affairs, and produced a bankruptcy, and in an evil hour he committed a forgery on the East India company, for which he was tried and executed, 1783.

RYMER, Thomas, an eminent English antiquary, born in Yorkshire, and educated at Northallerton school, and at Cambridge. He afterwards entered at Gray's inn, and in 1692 became historiographer to William III. He devoted some of his time to poetry, but his tragedy of Edgar possesses little merit, and his "View of the Tragedies of the last Age," displays his abilities as a critic in a very unfavorable light, as severe, partial, and uncandid, and an acrimonious detractor of the immortal reputation of Shakespeare. The best known work of Rymer is his Fœdera, in 20 vols. folio, a most valuable collection, containing public acts, conventions, treaties, state papers, letters, foreign correspondence, reprinted at the Hague in 10 vols. abridged by Rapin, and translated by Whatley in 4 vols. 8vo. 1731.

RYSBRAC, John Michael, an eminent statuary, who died in London 1770, aged about 78.

RYSBRAECK, Peter, a native of Antwerp, 1657. He acquired reputation as a landscape painter, and particularly excelled in the strong and spirited representation of trees, and the other beauties of rural scenery.

R Y V

RYVES, for Thomas, a civilian, born in Dorsetshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He applied himself to the civil law in Doctors Commons, and distinguished himself greatly in that profession. He was made master in chancery, king's advocate, and was knighted by Charles I. whom he served with great ability, not only in the cabinet, but in the field during the civil wars. He died in 1651, and was buried in St. Clement Danes, near Temple bar. He was a learned man, and wrote the Vicar's Plea — Historia Navalis Antiqua — Historia Navalis Media, &c.

RYVES, Bruno, a celebrated preacher, related to the preceding. He was chaplain to Charles I. and for his attachment to his master, was exposed, during the civil wars, to persecution and plunder; but at the restoration, he was made dean of Windsor, and secretary to the Garter. He died 1677. He was author of "Mercurius Rusticus," a political paper, first printed, 22d Aug. 1642 — Querela Cantabrigienfis, &c. — a Catalogue of those Lords, Persons of Quality, &c. slain or executed during the civil war — some Sermons, &c.

RYVES, Eliza, an Irish lady, known for her literary abilities. Her family was respectable; but a law-suit devoured the little property which she possessed, and she found protection and subsistence by the labors of her pen. She wrote the Hermit of Snowdon, a novel — besides some popular translations from the French, and a liberal contribution to the annual registers. She died in London, 1797.

SA, or SAA, Emanuel, a jesuit, born at Condé in Portugal. He was public professor of theology at Coimbra and Rome, and then became a preacher, and was employed by Pius V. to complete a new edition of the bible. He wrote besides, Scholia in quatuor Evangelia — Notationes in totam Sacram Scripturam — Aphorismi Confessariorum, and died at Arona, 30th Dec. 1596, aged 66.

SA DE MIRANDA, Francis, a native of Coimbra, knight of the order of Christ, and professor of jurisprudence in the university. He quitted the profession of the law after his father's death, and though honored by the king of Portugal, he preferred a life of ease and retirement to the intrigues of the court. He died at his country seat, 1558, aged 65. His works are, satires — comedies — and pastorals, printed together at Lisbon, 1614, in 4to. — Though the first, he is not the most correct poet of his nation.

SAADAS GAON, a Jewish rabbi, author of a book on the Belief of the Jews — an Arabic translation of the Old Testament — Commentaries on Ezra and Daniel — Explanation of the Jezirah. He was at the head of the school at Sora, near Babylon, and died 943.

SAAS, John, a native of Franqueville, near Rouen, who died of an apoplexy, 10th April 1774, aged 72. He was member of the Rouen academy, secretary to the archbishop, and afterwards canon of the church, and librarian. He wrote an Account of the MSS. of the Cathedral of Rouen — an Abridgement of the French Historical Dictionary, 4 vols. — Criticisms on the Supplement to Moreri — on the Encyclopedie, &c. and other things.

SAAVEDRA, Michael de Cervantes, a celebrated Spanish writer, author of Don Quixote, born at Madrid, 1549. He was from his very youth unusually fond of reading novels, and curious adventures, and thus he began to lay the foundation for those comic and striking incidents which prove so amusing and so interesting in his hero. He quitted Spain for Italy, and he was chamberlain to cardinal Aquaviva at Rome. He was also for some time engaged in the hardy profession of a soldier, under the victorious Colonna, and was at the battle of Lepanto, 1571, in which he lost his left hand, which was either shot, or dreadfully maimed by an arquebus. In 1574 he was unfortunately taken by a Barbary corfair, and carried to Algiers, where he endured, for five years and a half, all the horrors of captivity, till ransomed by the religious society of redemption. On his return to Spain, he began to write comedies and tragedies for his maintenance; but though his pieces were acted with universal applause at Madrid, he pined in poverty, and at last found himself in a prison. In his confinement he began his Don Quixote, of which the first part appeared in 1605, and the second part ten years after. This immortal work was a strong and pleasant satire on the books of knight errantry, which were then so fashionable in Spain, and it met with universal approbation; and though written to ridicule the follies of a particular age, it continues still to be read and admired in every known language. Though deservedly popular, Cervantes, such is too often the fate of literary men, was little noticed by the great; the book was read, but the author was neglected, and he could not obtain the small pittance of a pension, which might have kept him above want. Yet, in the midst of his wretchedness, he preserved his serenity and pleasantness, and in his last moments displayed that unconcern and jocularity which would have become a happier period of life. He received extreme unction at Madrid, 18th April, 1616, and died soon after, but what day is not ascertained. Besides Don Quixote, and dramatic pieces, he wrote the Troubles of Persiles and Sigismunda, a novel — Galatea, a novel in six books.

SAAVEDRA FAJARDO, Diego, a noble Spaniard, born in Murcia. He was for some time ambassador in Switzerland, and was made knight of St. Jago, and member of the supreme council of the Indies. He wrote Idea of a Politic Prince — the Gothic Crown — the Literary Republic, a work of merit, translated into French at Lausanne, 1770. He died 1648.

SABAS, an heresiarch, founder of the Messalians. In his eagerness after perfection, he interpreted the gospel literally; he made himself an eunuch, and distributed all his goods to the poor. This sect, which prevailed near Edessa about 310, was extinct at the end of the century. — There was another of that name, who became head of the monasteries of Palestine, and died highly respected, 5th Dec. 531, aged 92.

SABATEI-SEVI, a Jewish impostor, born at Smyrna, 1626. With great natural talents, well cultivated by education, he formed the design of imposing himself upon the Jews as their long promised Messiah. After some persecution, he was received at Jerusalem as an extraordinary character, and the dispersed Hebrews were invited to come and salute their deliverer. In the madness of his ambition, Sevi declared himself king of kings, and amused his deluded followers with pretended communications with the divinity, and a promise that the holy temple would descend all complete and beautifully adorned, from heaven, and that on it to the end of the world, would be regularly offered the adoration of all the nations of the earth. While the vulgar, lost in astonishment, even forgot their usual employments in hopes of the promised happiness, the impostor marched towards Constantinople, where he expected obedience and submission. He was, however, seized; but such was the enthusiasm of his followers, that his keeper was enriched by the presents which he received to permit the multitude to kiss the feet of his prisoner. When brought before the sultan Mahomet, Sevi refused to perform miracles to prove his divine mission, and preferred embracing Mahometanism to the dangerous experiment of being exposed as invulnerable to the arrows of skilful archers. As his conversion was not sincere, the sultan still detained him in prison, and there he died 1676, aged 50.

SABBATHIER, Peter, a native of Poitiers, of the order of the Benedictines of St. Maur. For twenty years he was engaged in making a collection of the Latin versions of the bible, which was published in 1743, under the title of Bibliorum Sacrorum Latine Versiones Antiquæ, 3 vols. folio. The two last volumes were published, not by the author, but by Charles de la Rue. He died at Rheims, 24th March 1742, aged 60.

SABELLICUS, Mark Anthony Cocceius, a learned Italian, born at Vicovaro, and made professor of belles lettres at Udina, and librarian to St. Mark's at Venice. He was an able teacher, and began an Universal History, of which one vol. appeared, besides an History of the Venetian Republic, folio, and other pieces in prose and verse, &c. He died 1506, aged about 70.

SABELLIUS, an African, founder of a sect in the third century, which denied any distinction in the three persons of the Trinity. This heresy, which had many followers, was condemned by the council of Constantinople, 381.

SABEO, Faulus, a native of Bresse in the Venetian territory, who distinguished himself as a poet. His edition of Arnobius, Rome, 1542, in folio, is much valued. He was honored with a gold chain from the emperor Henry II. to whom he dedicated his epigrams, 1556. He died about 1558, aged 80.

SABINA, Julia, wife of Adrian, was celebrated for her respectable character in public and private life. Her husband, at his death, prevailed upon her to take poison, and not to survive him, A.D. 138.

SABINUS, Aulus, a Latin poet in the age of Ovid. His epistles were said to possess merit. They have perished.

SABINUS, Francis Floridus, author of Interpretations of the Civil Law — of an Apology for the Latin Language, &c.; was a very learned and polite Italian writer, and died about 1547.

SABINUS, George, an excellent modern Latin poet. He was born in the electorate of Brandenburg, 1508, and by his talents acquired the esteem of the learned of his times. He married, in 1536, Melancthon's eldest eldest daughter, after whose death, at Konigsberg, 1547, he settled at Frankfort on the Oder, where, in the character of professor, he acquired great celebrity. He was patronized by the elector of Brandenburg, and also employed in various negotiations by the emperor Charles V. who esteemed him, and respected his talents. He died in consequence of an illness contracted in Italy, 1560. His Res Gestæ Cæsarium Romanorum, and other poems, are well known.

SABLIER, N. a French writer of eminence. He published Variétés Sérieuses & Amusantes, 4 vols. 12mo. — Essai sur les Langues, 8vo. — besides translations from Goldoni, &c. He died at Paris, 10th March, 1785, aged 93. Another of that name wrote two dramatic pieces for the Italian theatre, and died about 1760.

SABLIÈRE, Anthony de Rambouillet de la, a French poet. He died at Paris, 1680, and his Madrigals, admired for their simplicity and delicate sentiments, were published by his son. His wife, Hesselin, seemed to retain his virtues, and she was the friend of the learned, and particularly of Fontaine, who has repaid her kindness, and the honorable asylum which for many years she gave him in her family, by immortalizing her name in his poems.

SACCHI, Andrea, an Italian painter, born at Rome, 1601. He studied with great assiduity, the labors of his predecessors, and the antique marbles; and by the directions of Albani, and his own exertions, he soon acquired a celebrity superior to that of his contemporaries. He was ambitious to be correct, and therefore did little, and but slowly; and as he said, he never did any thing but what he proposed should be seen by Raphael and Hannibal. He was patronized by some of the cardinals, and particularly by Urban VIII., whose picture he drew, and in such a correct style as to be equal to the best efforts of ancient or modern times. He died 1661.

SACCHINI, Antoine Marie Gaspar, an able musician, born at Naples, 1735. He studied under Durante; and at Rome, Venice, and Naples, he began to display those great powers of composition and harmony which procured him so much applause in Germany, Holland, England, and Paris. He was of a benevolent disposition, and died at Paris, 1786. His operas were much admired.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, an English divine of celebrated notoriety. He was son of a poor clergyman at Marlborough, and was educated by the kindness of his god-father, and placed at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he became demy, 1687, and afterwards fellow. His regularity and polite manners rendered him a favorite tutor in the college, and his Latin poems, some of which appeared in the Musæ Anglicanæ, proved him an elegant scholar and a man of respectable talents. He was, at Oxford, the contemporary and the friend of Addison, who inscribed his farewell poem to the muses, to him, as his dearest friend and colleague. He took his master's degree 1696, and that of D. D. 1708. His first preferment was Cannock, Staffordshire, to which, in 1705, was added the preacher'ship of St. Saviour's, Southwark. His two famous sermons were delivered at Derby, 14th

Aug. 1709, and at St. Paul's, Nov. 9th, before the lord mayor, and as in one of them he was supposed to allude, under the name of Volpone, to lord Godolphin, they excited great attention, and drew upon him the resentment of parliament. His trial before the peers, began 27th Feb. 1709-10, and ended the 23d March; but though he was suspended for three years from preaching, and his sermons were burnt by the hands of the executioner, so violent was the party spirit of the times, that in laying the foundation of his future preferment it completely overturned the ministry. The queen saw with pleasure, the propagation of sentiments which enforced the divine rights of monarchs, and submissive obedience to her authority, and when the punishment of this persecuted divine, therefore, was expired, he was presented to the valuable living of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and received with such enthusiasm by the people, that of the first sermon which he preached, and which he sold for 100l., 40,000 copies were immediately distributed through the nation. Thus, for a while regarded as the champion of the church, and as the victim of party, Sacheverell enjoyed honors and popularity, till at last he sunk into retirement and obscurity. He died 5th June, 1724, and by his will, left 500l. to bishop Atterbury, who is supposed to have written for him the defence which he made before the peers, and to have composed the elegant Latin inscription for the silver bason gilt, which he presented to his counsel and defender sir Simon Harcourt. He is described by the duchess of Marlborough, who, no doubt, was displeased at his popularity, as an ignorant impudent incendiary, a man who was the scorn even of those who made use of him as a tool; and Burnet, with equal contempt, observes of him, that he possessed little of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense, but forced himself to preferment by railing at dissenters and low church men.

SACHTLEVEN, Herman, a native of Rotterdam, whose landscapes were held in high esteem. He died 1685, aged 76. His relation Cornelius was also eminent in landscape painting, but inferior to him.

SACKVILLE, Thomas, first lord Buckhurst, was born at Buckhurst, Sussex, 1536. He was entered at Oxford, and then removed to Cambridge, and afterwards to the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar. He early acquired celebrity by his "Induction, or Introduction to the Myrror of Magistrates," a series of poems, and by his "Gorboduc," a tragedy, acted in 1561, with great applause at Whitehall, before the queen. When thus distinguished as a writer, he laid down his pen and became a statesman. He was called up to the peerage, and served Elizabeth, to whom he was related by her mother's side, in various negotiations. In 1590 he was made knight of the garter, and the next year chancellor of Oxford, and in 1598, treasurer in the room of lord Burleigh. Though he had been one of the commissioners who tried the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots, he was noticed by James, on his accession to the English crown, and was created, 1604, earl of Dorset. He died suddenly, in consequence of a dropy in the brain, while attending at the council board, April, 1608, and was buried in Westminster abbey. It appears according cording to the testimony of Naunton, and others, that he was an able, virtuous, and magnanimous statesman, and few first ministers have left so fair a character. Several of his letters have been printed in the Cabala, &c.

SACKVILLE, Charles, earl of Dorset and Middlesex, descended from lord Buckhurst, was born 1637. He was educated under a private tutor, and afterwards travelled through France and Italy, and returned a little before the restoration. He sat for some time as member for East Grinstead; but he was too fond of gallantry, and the licentious excesses of a corrupt court, to apply himself to political affairs. He served as volunteer in the Dutch war in 1665, under the duke of York, and the night previous to the naval engagement, composed a celebrated song, still regarded as the best of his poetical pieces. He was afterwards employed in embassies by the king, and in 1674 succeeded to the estates of his uncle, earl of Middlesex, and to the honors of his father two years after. The violent measures of James were wholly disagreeable to him, and he warmly espoused the cause of the prince of Orange, and accompanied Anne in her flight to Northampton, and for his attachment to the revolution, he was made chamberlain of the household, a privy counsellor, and knight of the garter. He died at Bath, 19th Jan. 1705-6, and was succeeded by Lionel, his son by his second wife, who in 1720, was raised to the dignity of a duke. Lord Dorset was not only a poet, but also the friend and patron of learned men, and he has been commended in the highest strain of panegyric and admiration, by Dryden, Congreve, Addison, and especially by Prior, whose dedication of his works to his son is deservedly considered as a composition of superior merit. His poems are short and few, but possess great beauty.

SACKVILLE, Edward, earl of Dorset and grandson of the above, was born 1590. He was sent in 1620 with a force to assist Frederic, king of Bohemia, and was at the battle of Prague, fought that year, and in 1621 he went as ambassador from England to the French court. His abilities recommended him strongly to the favor of his master Charles, and after his brother's death, to whose title and estates he succeeded, 1624, he was advanced in the government, and made knight of the garter, president of the council, and lord privy seal. He died 1652, and was succeeded by his son Richard, who died 1677. There is in the 129th paper of the Guardian, an account of a duel which he fought in Zealand with lord Bruce, in 1613, and in which he killed his antagonist.

SACKVILLE, George viscount, third son of the first duke of Dorset, was born in 1716. From Westminster school he went to Ireland, where his father was appointed viceroy, and he received his education in Trinity college, Dublin. He afterwards embraced the military profession, and was at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy, and distinguished himself under the duke of Cumberland, against the Scotch rebels. In 1758, he rose to the rank of lieutenant general, and went with Marlborough in the expedition against St. Malo's. At the battle of Minden, the next year, where he commanded the united English and Hanoverian cavalry, his conduct was highly censured, because during the action he did not bring up his troops with the celerity which he was ordered. Whether the delay originated in the unintelligible manner in which the orders were conveyed, or the timidity of the general, is unknown; but a court martial dismissed him from the service, and his name was struck off from the list of privy counsellors. These severe measures were condemned in the next reign, and he was restored to the favor and protection of his sovereign, and advanced to places of trust and honor. In 1769 he assumed the name of Germaine, according to the will of lady Elizabeth Germaine, to whose property he succeeded, and the next year he attracted much of the public notice by the duel which he fought with governor Johnstone, who, in one of his speeches in the house of Commons, had reflected on his conduct with more asperity than good manners permitted. He was, in 1775, made secretary of state for the colonial department, and also first lord of the board of trade; but on the change of ministry, he gave up his appointment, and in 1782 he was created a viscount. He died 26th Aug. 1785.

SACY, Lewis de, an eloquent advocate of the parliament of Paris, and a learned member of the French academy. He published an excellent French translation of Pliny's Letters, and Panegyric on Trajan, 3 vols. 12mo. — treatises on Friendship — and on Glory — a Collection of Facts, and other pieces, 2 vols. 4to. He died at Paris, 26th Oct. 1727, aged 73.

SADDER, or SAAHDI, a famous Persian poet, born at Schiraz, 1193. The invasion of Persia by the Turks, drove him into Palestine, where he fell into the hands of the Franks, then on a crusade, and was treated as a slave, till ransomed by the kindness of an Aleppo merchant, whose rich daughter he married. This union proved not the source of happiness, and the poet complained bitterly of the disagreeable temper and manners of his wife. He died, it is said, at the advanced age of 116. His poems have been much admired, though Voltaire and others affect to speak of them with contempt. They consist of Gulistan, or the Garden of Flowers — Bostan, or the Garden of Fruits — and Molaamat, the Sparkles, &c. which have been translated at Calcutta, 1795, folio.

SADE, N. de, abbot of Ebreuil, died 1780, in an advanced age. He published Memoirs of the Life of Petrarch, 3 vols. 4to. a work of merit.

SADELER, John, a native of Brussels, 1550, eminent as a designer and engraver. He was patronized by the duke of Bavaria, and after travelling into Italy, and presenting some of his pieces to Clement VIII. who received them with barren praise, he returned to Venice, where he died. His brother and pupil Raphael, was also an excellent artist. He accompanied his brother to Rome, and died at Venice. — Their nephew Giles, was superior to his uncles in taste, and in the neatness and elegance of his engravings. He was for some time in Italy, and was patronized by the emperor Rodolphus II. and his two successors. He died at Prague, 1629, aged 59. His Vestiges of the Antiquities of Rome, folio, 1660, are much and deservedly admired.

SADLER, sir Ralph, a statesman, born at Hackney in Middlesex, 1507. He was educated under Cromwell earl of Essex, and by his abilities and good conduct became known to Henry VIII. who employed him in several political affairs, and at last admitted him into the privy council, and made him secretary of state. He was at the battle of Musselburgh in Scotland, and for his bravery was made a knight banneret. After being also in favor with Elizabeth, and holding under her offices of trust and honor, he died at his seat of Standon, Herts, 30th March, 1587, aged 80, leaving behind him three sons and four daughters.

SADLER, John, an English writer, born in Shropshire, 1615, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He entered afterwards at Lincoln's inn, and was in 1644 made master in chancery, and in 1649 town clerk of London. He was in great favor with Cromwell, and was offered, by him, the place of chief justice of Munster in Ireland, which he declined. He was also member of parliament; but at the restoration he lost all his places, because he refused to subscribe to the oath which declared it unlawful, under any pretence whatever, to take up arms against the king. To this public misfortune was afterwards added the loss of some of his houses by the great fire of London, and in consequence of these calamities, he retired to privacy on his estate of Warmwell, Dorsetshire, where he died, April 1674, aged 59. He wrote Rights of the Kingdom, or Customs of our Ancestors, &c. much esteemed — and “Olbia”, or the New Island discovered, &c.

SADLER, Anthony, a native of Chilton, Wilts, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of D. D. He was chaplain to Charles II. after the restoration, and published a Divine Masque, inscribed to general Monk — several tracts — sermons, &c. and died 1680.

SADOC, supposed founder of the sect of the Sadducees among the Jews, lived two centuries before the birth of Christ. His tenets were, that virtue, for its own sake, is to be loved and practised, as there are neither rewards nor punishments after this life. These opinions were very prevalent, and in the days of our Saviour, the sect was become very numerous and powerful. It is said that the Sadducees still exist in Africa, and in other places.

SADOLET, James, a learned Italian born at Modena 1477. He received an excellent education under his father, who was a civilian, and professor at Ferrara, and acquired a most extensive and perfect knowledge of Latin and Greek. He lived in great intimacy with the learned at Rome, and became with Bembo secretary to pope Leo X. and to reward his merit the sovereign pontiff made him against his will bishop of Carpentras, near Avignon, and he held the same office of honorable confidence with some of his successors, Clement VII., and Paul III. who raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and employed him in various negotiations. He died 1547, not without suspicion, say some, of poison, because he maintained too confidential a correspondence with the protestants. His works consist of epistles, discourses, expositions of the Psalms, and St. Paul's epistles, poems, &c. published at Verona, 3 vols. 4to. These compositions are written in elegant and truly Ciceronian Latin; and to the character of a polite scholar, Sadolet united the amiable qualities of mildness, moderation, and exemplary virtue, so that Erasmus has called him with truth, eximium ætatis suæ decus.

SAGE, Alain René le, an ingenious writer born at Ruys in Brittany 1667. His compositions display not only wit, taste, and judgment, but elegance and neatness. Though indebted for the plan and subject of his romances to Spanish writers, yet he possessed peculiar merits of his own. His works are “Gil Blas” — the Diable Boiteux — besides the Bachelier de Salamanque — the New Don Quixote, and other theatrical pieces, and the letters of Aristenetus from the Greek. His Gil Blas is, and ever will be, a popular performance, and must be read, because, as Voltaire has observed, he has imitated nature. He died near Paris 1747.

SAGE, David le, a French poet, born at Montpellier. He wrote the Follies of Le Sage, containing epigrams, satires, sonnets, elegies, &c. and died about 1650.

SAGE, John, a native of Fifeshire, educated at St. Andrew's, and made, after the revolution, bishop of Edinburgh. He was an able divine, and published a sensible defence of episcopacy, against the persecution of the presbyterians, called the Principles of the Cyprianic age, and other tracts, and died 1711, aged 59.

SAGITTARIUS, Gaspard, a native of Lunenburg, who became professor of history in the university of Hall, and historian to the duke of Saxony. He was also, as a divine, an able supporter of the doctrines of Luther. He published Dissertations on the Oracles — the Succession of the Princes of Orange to William III. — History of the City of Hardewyck — Life of St. Norbert — Historia Antiqua Norbergie — Genealogy of the Dukes of Brunswick — History of Lybeck — Antiquities of Thuringia, &c. This learned man died 9th March, 1694, aged 51.

SAGREDO, John, a noble Venetian, procurator of St. Mark, and in 1675 elected doge, and afterwards employed as ambassador to various courts. He wrote the History of the Ottoman empire, in Italian, 1677, 4to. a work valuable, candid, and elegant, and deservedly compared to the labors of Tacitus. A translation of it in 6 vols. 12mo. appeared at Paris.

SAILLANT, N. du, a French officer who at the beginning of the revolution raised around his retreat at Jales near Mende, an army of nearly 20,000 men, who like himself were zealous for the defence of the monarchy, and the protection of the king's person. While, however, he hoped to persuade these adherents to march with him against Paris, he found their loyalty grow faint, and soon saw them desert from his ranks. He was at last surrounded with the few brave men who determined to share his fortunes, and conducted to Vans where he was massacred in cold blood.

SAINT-AMAND, Mark Antony Gerard de, a native of Rouen, who spent the best part of his life in travelling, and in writing poetry. He might have obtained tained a settlement near the person of the queen of Poland, but in his inconstant conduct he refused it, and died poor 1660, aged 67, and of grief, because Lewis XIV. censured his poem on the Moon. His name is immortalized in Boileau's satires. His best piece is an Ode on Solitude. His works are collected in 3 vols. 12mo.

SAINT-ANDRE', Nathanael, a native of Switzerland who became eminent in this country as a reader on anatomy, and as a surgeon. His character was ruined for the foolish part which he acted with respect to Mary Toftes, the rabbit impostor. He died at Southampton, 1776. More particulars about him are recorded in Nichols' Anecdotes of Hogarth.

SAINT-AULAIRE, Francis Joseph de Beauvoir, marguis de, an ingenious French poet, born at Limosin. He spent the younger part of his life in the army, but his love of literature prevailed, and he sought retirement and learned ease. He wrote short and light pieces, much in the manner of Anacreon, and what is remarkable his best compositions were those of his old age, when he had reached his 90th year. He was admitted into the French academy, though Boileau exclaimed against it, because he was an immoral poet. He was for 40 years the favorite of the court of the dukes of Maine, and died at Paris 17th Dec. 1742, aged near 100.

SAINT-CYR, Tannequil de Bouchet, a brave Poitevin of the party of the Calvinists under Charles IX. He was chief of the conspiracy of Amboise, and was made governor of Orleans, after the battle of Dreux. He was killed, bravely fighting, at the battle of Montcontour, 1569, aged 85.

SAINT-CYRAN, John du Verger, de Houranne, abbot of, a learned ecclesiastic born at Bayonne, 1581. He was educated in divinity at Louvain, where he gained the friendship of Lipsius, and he was patronized by the bishop of Poitiers, who resigned to him the abbey of St. Cyr. He wrote various books, and was universally esteemed for his learning. He became celebrated in France for maintaining what was called two extraordinary paradoxes, that a person under certain circumstances may kill himself, and that bishops may take up arms. He was for some time persecuted by Richelieu, and he was one of those who disapproved of the council of Trent, and considered it as a political assembly, rather than as an ecclesiastical meeting. He died of an apoplexy at Paris 1643.

SAINT-EVREMOND, Vid. EVREMOND.

SAINT-FOIX, Germain Francis Poullain de, a French writer born at Rennes, 25th Feb. 1703. After serving in the army he settled at Paris, and devoted himself to literature. He was appointed historiographer of the order of the Holy Ghost, and died highly respected at Paris, 26th Aug. 1776. His works are Turkish Letters, an epistolary romance of merit, yet inferior to the work of Montesquieu in the same style — Historical Essays on Paris, 7 vols. 12mo. — History of the Order of the Holy Ghost, 3 vols. 12mo. — Comedies, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. All his works were published together at Paris, 6 vols. 8vo. 1778.

SAINT-GELAIS, Octavian de, a native of Cognac, who by the favor of Charles VIII. was made bishop of Angouleme. He died 1502, aged 36. He is author of some poetical pieces, the Life of Lewis XII. — Translation of Terence — Ovid's Heroides, &c.

SAINT-GELAIS, Melin de, the natural son of the preceding, as is generally supposed, became known as a poet, and deserved the name of the French Ovid. He was educated at Poitiers, and Padua, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession. He opposed Ronsard the poet, at the court of Henry II. but this jealousy ended in the closest friendship. He died at Paris, 1559, aged 67. His works are in Latin and in French, and consist of elegies, epistles, sonnets, epigrams, songs, &c. Sophonisba, a prose tragedy, and were first published at Paris, 1719 in 12mo.

SAINT-GENNIEZ, John de, a native of Avignon, who became canon of Orange, and died there 1663, aged 56. He wrote some satires, elegies, idyls, and other poetical pieces of great merit, collected together at Paris in 4to.

SAINT-GERMAIN, Robert, count of, a native of Lons-le-Saunier in Franche Comté, who left the Jesuits for the profession of arms. He distinguished himself in Hungary, and in the war of 1737, against the Turks, and afterwards in the French service, in the campaigns of 1741 and 1757. Displeased, however, with the treatment of the French court, he went into the service of Denmark, where he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal, and made knight of the Elephant. The death of Struensee, and the commotion which took place on the occasion, rendered him dissatisfied with the Danish court, and he retired to Hamburg, where he lost nearly the whole of his property by the failure of a banker, to whom he had entrusted it. This severe blow did not break his spirits, and he withdrew to the privacy of a small estate which he had near Lauterbach in Alsace. He was called away from his obscurity by Lewis XVI. who knew his merit, to preside over the war department, and after reforming several abuses, and contributing to the comforts of the military, he died 15th Jan. 1778, aged 70. He wrote Memoirs, 1 vol. 8vo. 1779.

SAINT-GERMAIN, N. count de, an impostor of some temporary celebrity, who pretended to have lived 2000 years, and to have sat by the side of our Saviour at the marriage of Cana. He died at Sleswick, 1784.

SAINT-HYACINTHE, Thémiseul de, a French writer born at Orleans, 1684. He taught Italian for his support, and after travelling over several countries of Europe he settled at Breda, where he married, and where he died 1746. He forced himself much upon the public notice by his quarrel with Voltaire who heaped upon him every opprobrious epithet. He wrote Le Chef d'Œuvre d'un Inconnu, 2 vols. 8vo. — Mathanassiana, 2 vols. 8vo. — some romances of little merit, &c.

SAINT-JOHN, Henry, viscount Bolingbroke, a great politician and philosopher, born 1672 at Battersea, of an illustrious family. He was educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, and though his earlier years were disgraced by extravagance, and an immoderate love of pleasure, he laid the foundation of that eminence which afterwards distinguished him as an orator, and as a statesman. To wean him from dissolute habits his friends married him to the daughter of sir Henry Winchcombe, and soon after he obtained a seat in parliament for Wotton-Basset, 1700. He here acquired great influence among the Tories, and in 1704; was made secretary at war, but resigned when his friend Harley was dismissed from the seals in 1707. Three years after he again shared the honors of Harley, who was called to the office of chancellor of the exchequer, and he became secretary of state; but the part which he supported in framing the peace of Utrecht has exposed him to much censure. In 1712, he was created lord St. John, viscount Bolingbroke, and made lord lieutenant of Essex; but dissatisfied with these honors because he was not raised to the rank of an earl, he ambitiously meditated a separation from his long tried friend Harley, and in the attempt to place himself at the head of affairs, he ruined his own fortunes, and those of his former associate. On the accession of George I. in 1714, the seals were taken from him, though he had shown himself a friend to the Hanoverian succession, and all the papers of his office were also secured. Finding it dangerous to continue in the country, where threats of impeachment were thrown out against him, he retired to France, March, 1715, and he resolutely rejected the overtures which were made to him by the pretender. The persecuting spirit, however, of his enemies at home, made a change in his sentiments, and he accepted at last the office of secretary of state to the pretender, and prepared for the invasion of England. These measures were no sooner known than he was impeached by Walpole; but while disgraced at home, he was exposed to equal persecution abroad, and his new master stripped him of his office and impeached him of treachery, incapacity, and neglect. Thus discarded he determined to effect a reconciliation with the government at home, and by means of lord Stair, the ambassador in France, he obtained a promise of pardon from the king, 1716, which was fully granted in 1723. Restored to his country, and to his forfeited property, he settled near Uxbridge, and devoted himself to literary and rural employments, and to the conversation and correspondence of Swift, Pope, and other learned friends; but finding the royal mercy not granted to its full extent, as he was still excluded from a seat in the House of Lords, he vented his disappointment against the minister, Walpole, and attacked his measures in the Craftsman, and in some pamphlets. For ten years he showed his opposition and virulent hostility against the minister, and then laid aside his pen, and retired in 1735 to France, resolved never again to enlist in political contests. He afterwards returned to England, and settled at Battersea, where the last part of his life was spent in the otium cum dignitate. He died there 15th Nov. 1751, on the verge of 80. His manuscripts were left to Mallet, who published them with the rest of his works in 5 vols. 4to. 1754. His works may be divided into political and philosophical, the former consisting of Letters upon History — Letter to Wyndham, on patriotism — Papers in the Craftsman published separately in 3 vols. 8vo. under the title of political tracts, &c. — and the latter — substance of letters written to de Pouilly — Letter on one of Tillotson's sermons — letters and essays, addressed to Pope. As a writer lord Bolingbroke was nervous, elegant, and argumentative, and in him were united as a panegyrist has observed, the wisdom of Socrates, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace. It is, however, to be lamented that in his writings he is too often sceptical, and that he disregards or ridicules the great truths of revelation, and of christianity. As the friend of poets, and of wits, he has also acquired reputation; and Pope, who esteemed him to adoration, has immortalized himself and his noble friend, in the Essay on Man, which he began and finished by his persuasion. He married in 1716, for his second wife, a niece of Madame de Maintenon, widow of the marquis de Villette; but as he died without issue his estates and titles were inherited by his nephew.

SAINT-JUST, Louis Leon de, one of the sanguinary revolutionists of France, was born at Blerancourt near Noyon 1768. He obtained a seat in the national convention, and gained the friendship of Robespierre, by devoting himself to his infamous purposes, and by supporting all his cruel measures. His easy eloquence, his bold effrontery, and unappalled conduct, rendered him a fit partner for all the atrocities of that dreadful period, and by his influence the property of the emigrants was exposed to sale, the Girondists were conducted to the scaffold, and the effects of foreigners were confiscated. The reign of Louis XVI. was described by this artful and shameless orator as a scene of horrible tyranny; while the government of Robespierre exhibited nothing but benevolence and happiness to the people of France. The punishment of this worthless tyrant at last approached, and after he had insulted the feelings of human nature, interpreted pity into crimes, and condemned to death those who presumed to weep for the loss of their friends and relatives, it was not to be expected that he could excite much of the commiseration of the world. He was conducted to the scaffold with Robespierre, in 1794, and suffered death with more courage than could have been expected from such a tyrant. He wrote Esprit de la Revolution, &c. 8vo. 1791.

SAINT-LAMBERT, Charles Francis de, member of the French academy, and afterwards of the national institute, was born at Nanci 1717, and died at the age of 85. He was the friend of Voltaire, and his genius and poetical abilities gained him the esteem of the learned of France. He wrote Les Fêtes de l'Amour, a comedy — Essay on Luxury — the Four Parts of the Day — the Seasons, a poem, which Voltaire prefers, but with injudicious partiality, to the Seasons of Thomson — Oriental Fables, besides fugitive pieces, &c.

SAINT-MARK, Charles Hugh le Fevre de, a French writer, born at Paris 1698. After studying at Plessis and at the Mazarin college, he embraced the military profession, which he soon quitted for literature. He died at Paris, 20th Nov. 1769. He edited the Memoirs of Marquis de Feuquieres — Rapin's History of England — Despreaux's Works — the Life of Hecquet — the Works of Pavillon, Chaulieu, &c.

SAINT-MARTIN, N. a native of Amboise, who, after serving six years in the army, retired to privacy and literature. The retirement which he loved, and the sweetness of his manners saved him during the horrors of the revolution, and he died at Aunai in the house of a friend, in the beginning of 1804, aged 60. He is author of an excellent book on Error and Truth, 8vo. 1775, often edited — a Picture of Natural Order, 8vo.

SAINT-NECTAIRE, Magdalen de, a French heroine, famous in the wars of the protestants. She ably defended her castle of Miremont in Limousin, against the superior forces of her enemies.

SAINT-NON, John Claude Richard de, counsellor of the parliament of Paris, is author of Julia, a comedy, and of a voyage pittoresque to Naples and Sicily, 5 vols. fol. with 417 plates. He died at Paris, 25th Nov. 1791, aged 64.

SAINT-PAVIN, Denys Sanguin de, a French poet. He was an ecclesiastic, but he preferred literature and pleasure to the austerities of a monastic life, and after spending much of his time in frivolous and often profane pursuits, he died very penitent 1670, in an advanced old age. He was attacked by Boileau in his satires, and he retorted the censure. His poems consist of epigrams, sonnets, epistles, &c. published in 1759, with those of Charleval, 12mo.

SAINT-PHALIER, Frances Theresa Aumele de, a French lady, who wrote the Confident Rival, a comedy, and some other poetical pieces, and died at Paris 1757.

SAINT-PIERRE, Eustache de, a native of Calais, celebrated for his noble disinterestedness and patriotism. When Edward III. in 1347, displeased with the obstinate resistance of the people of Calais, demanded six of the chief men to be devoted to death, Saint-Pierre in the midst of the hesitation of his countrymen offered himself, and walked with five others, who followed his great example to the conqueror, with halts about their necks. The English queen by her intreaties with difficulty obtained the pardon of these devoted men.

SAINT-PIERRE, Charles Irenæus Castel de, a French ecclesiastic, born in Normandy 1658. He accompanied cardinal de Polignac to the conferences of Utrecht, but though a popular character he was excluded from the French academy, for preferring the measures of the regent duke of Orleans, to those of Lewis XIV. He was very intelligent as a man of letters, and as a politician, and died at Paris 29th April, 1743, aged 86. He was author of a project for universal peace among the European powers, 3 vols. 12mo. — Project for reforming the Orthography of the European Languages — Memoirs on Various Subjects, &c. His works have been collected in 18 vols. 12mo. 1744.

SAINT-PREVIL, Francis de Jussac d'Embleville de, a French warrior, distinguished at the battle of Castelnaudary, in which he took Montmorency prisoner, and at the siege of Corbia, which he defended against the Spaniards. He was afterwards governor of Arras, and was condemned to be beheaded by his political enemies, for having attacked by mistake a body of men who had surrendered prisoners of war. He suffered at Amiens, 9th Nov. 1641, aged 40.

SAINT-SIMON, Louis de Rouvrai, duke of, a French statesman, born at Paris 16th June, 1675. He quitted the military service to become ambassador in Spain, 1721; but without sharing the guilt of the perfidious and artful measures of the government of the regent Orleans, he retired to his country seat where he composed his memoirs. He is accused of jansenism, and of reflecting with too much acrimony against his contemporaries. His works have appeared in 13 vols. 8vo. Strasbourg, 1791.

SAINT-VINCENT, John Francis Fauris de, a native of Aix, who distinguished himself as an upright magistrate, and president of the parliament of Provence. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, and contributed to its memoirs two valuable papers on the coins of Provence, and on the ancient monuments of Marseilles. He died 22d Oct. 1798, aged 80.

SAINT-YVES, Charles, an able oculist, born at Vienne near Rocroi. He acquired great reputation in his profession, and died 1736, aged 69. His treatise on the Disorders of the Eyes, 1722, 4to. and 1736, 8vo. is much admired.

SAINT-ALDEGONDE, Philip de Marnix, lord du Mont, an illustrious statesman, born at Brussels, 1538. He early signalized himself by the copious resources of his mind, and by a perfect knowledge of the classics, of civil law, politics and divinity; but when his country was persecuted by the tyranny of the Spaniards, he withdrew from oppression into Germany. At Heidelberg he was in consequence of his merits raised to the office of counsellor in ecclesiastical affairs; but the miseries of his country at last recalled him home in 1572, and he prepared to assert her liberties, and to defend her religion by the vigor of his mind. He was sent as one of the deputies to England to solicit the protection of Elizabeth, and afterwards went to the diet of Worms, and here his eloquence painted in frightful colors the tyranny of Alva, and called aloud for the assistance of the Germans. In 1580, he again served his country as ambassador, and went to France, and offered the sovereignty to the duke of Alençon, whom he the next year accompanied to England. He was, in 1584, consul of Antwerp, when that city was besieged by the duke of Parma, and he died at Leyden 1598, aged 60. For wisdom, sagacity, and decision, he is deservedly respected as one of the greatest politicians of his age. He published, in Dutch, 1571, Alvearium Romanum, a ludicrous work, which was received and read with great applause, as it ridiculed with well directed satire the church of Rome. His Tableau des Differens de la Religion, in French, published after his death, was equally popular. He wrote besides other things, and particularly a famous song in praise of prince William of Nassau, which animated his countrymen to resist their oppressors, and like the muse of Tyrtæus, roused them to despise dangers, and to brave death in the support of their rights and liberties.

SAINT-BEUVE, James de, a learned ecclesiastic, who who became divinity professor at the Sorbonne, from which he was expelled for not subscribing to the censure on Arnould. He died in retirement 15th Dec. 1677, aged 64. His decisions, 3 vols. 4to. were published by his brother.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Charles, a French physician, born 1512. He was honored with the patronage of Francis II. and of queen Margaret of Navarre, and wrote some elegant pieces in poetry and prose, in Latin as well as French. He died 1555.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Gaucher de, better known by the name of Scævola, was an active character under Henry III. and Henry IV. His conduct was very firm and loyal in the states of Blois, 1588, and afterwards by his influence he reconciled the town of Poitiers to the cause and interests of his master, whom he again served with successful zeal in the assembly of the notables at Rouen. He died at Loudun, 20th March, 1623, aged 87, honored with the title of father of his country. He wrote Gallorum Doctrinâ Illustrium, &c. elogia, besides some poetical pieces of great merit in Latin — epigrams, &c. collected together, in 1633, in 4to.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Abel de, eldest son of the preceding, was counsellor of state, and librarian at Fontainebleau. He wrote the Laurel — the Salic Law — elegies, odes, epigrams, &c. inferior in merit to the poetical compositions of his father. He died 1652, aged 82.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Gaucher de, or Scævola, and Louis de, twin brothers, sons of Scævola, were born at Loudun, 20th Dec. 1571. They resembled each other in their features, as well as in the qualities of their mind, and they both were appointed historiographers of France, and wrote together some valuable works. The elder died at Paris 7th Sep. 1650, and Louis 20th April, 1656, and their mutual affection was well depicted by this curious epitaph:

In geminis unum, geminos agnovit in uno

Ambos qui potuit doctus adire fenes.

Their works are Genealogical History of the Royal Family of France, 2 vols. fol. — the Genealogical History of the House of Beauvau, fol. &c.

SAINTE-MARTHE, Claude de, grandson of the Scævola just mentioned, embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and died in retirement at Courbeville, 11th Oct. 1690, aged 71. He wrote some theological pieces. His brother Denis, was also an ecclesiastic of great learning and exemplary piety, in the congregation of St. Maur. He wrote the Life of Cassiodorus — the History of Gregory the Great, &c. There were besides other members of that family also illustrious for learning.

SAINTE-PALAYE, John Baptist de la Curne de, a native of Auxerre, who became member of the French academies and of that of inscriptions. He devoted himself assiduously to the study of antiquities, and wrote some valuable works, especially on Ancient Chivalry, 3 vols. 12mo. He also formed the plan of an Universal French Glossary in 40 vols. fol. He died at Paris much respected 1st May, 1781, aged 84.

SALADIN or SALAHEDDIN, sultan of Egypt and Syria after Adad, was celebrated for his valor during the crusades. After conquering Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia, he marched to the attack of Jerusalem, and with an army of 50,000 men he defeated the christians near Tiberias, and took Guy de Lusignan the king of Jerusalem prisoner. This signal victory opened the gates of Jerusalem to his forces: but while all expected death Saladin behaved with humanity to the conquered, and restored to their wives and children the various captives who had been detained in slavery and in chains. These conquests alarmed the christians of Europe, and already the kings of England and France, with numerous forces marched to the relief of the oppressed christians of Palestine, but discord defeated their successes. Though Acre, Cæsarea, and Jaffa, yielded to the arms of the Europeans, Richard king of England found his forces so weak by desertion and discord, that he concluded a truce with the Egyptian sultan for three years and three months, 1192. Saladin died the next year at Damascus, aged 57, leaving 17 sons, who divided his extensive dominions among them. He was a man of high character, who viewed with the eyes of a sage and a christian the vanity of human grandeur. In his last illness he ordered to be unfurled before his army the winding sheet which was to encircle his remains, while a herald proclaimed aloud, this is all which Saladin the vanquisher of the East can retain of all his conquests. A French history of this extraordinary character was published in 1758, in 2 vols. 12mo. by M. Marin.

SALARIO, Andrew, an eminent painter, born at Milan 1487. He was a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, and his pieces were held in high estimation. He died at Florence at the age of 72.

SALDEN, William, a native of Utrecht, who became minister to the Hague church, where he died 1694. He wrote Otia Theologica, 4to. — Concionator Sacer, 12mo. — De Libris Variorumque Eorum usu et Abusu, a work of merit, 12mo.

SALE, George, a learned Englishman, well skilled in oriental literature. He contributed much to the completion of the universal history, but his chief work is a translation of the Koran, with notes, with a long and valuable preliminary discourse. He died in London, 14th Nov. 1736.

SALERNE, Francis, a physician of Orleans, who devoted himself to the elucidation of natural history. He published with Arnault, the Animal Kingdom — the Natural History of Animals, &c. He also translated Ray's Synopsis Avium. He died 1760.

SALESBURY, William, author of a Welsh dictionary — of some poems — of a treatise on rhetoric — and other works, flourished in Wales at the beginning of the 17th century. He was bred up to the law, and assisted bishop Davies in the translation of the New Testament into Welsh, an useful performance published 1620.

SALIAN, James, a jesuit of Avignon, who became rector of the college of Befançon, and died at Paris, 1640. He wrote several theological works, the best known of which is Annals of the Ancient Testament, in Latin, 6 vols. fol. 1625.

SALIMBENI, Venura, a native of Sienna, distinguished as a painter. His historical pieces were much admired. He died 1613, aged 56. His descent of the the holy ghost is still admired at lord Pembroke's, Wilton.

SALINAS, Francis de, a native of Burgos. Though he lost his sight at the age of 10, he acquired a most perfect knowledge of Greek and Latin, and of mathematics and music, and was liberally patronized by the duke of Alba, Paul IV. and others. He died 1590. He was author of an excellent treatise on music, fol. and he translated into Spanish verse some of Martial's epigrams.

SALINGUERRA, a chief of the Ghibelins, who seized upon Ferrara, in 1195, and defied the powers of the pope, and of the duke of Este. He afterwards was driven from his strong post by d'Este, and died in prison at Venice, 1240, aged 80.

SALIS, Ulysses de, a noble Swiss. After serving in the Venetian armies, he engaged in the wars of Val-teline, and then entered into the service of France. He distinguished himself at the siege of Rochelle under Lewis XIII. and afterwards went to the aid of his native country, whose independence the Austrians had threatened. In 1635, he, at the head of a French army, defeated the Spanish troops at Mont-Francisco, and afterwards signalized himself at the siege of Coni. He died in the country of the Grisons 1674, aged 79.

SALISBURY, John, an English divine in Stephen's reign. His works on subjects of antiquity and criticism are curious and valuable.

SALISBURY, Robert Cecil, earl of, an able statesman, son of William, lord Burleigh, born 1550. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and was introduced by his father into the business and the intrigues of political life. He was first secretary to lord Derby, ambassador in France, and in 1596, was made under secretary to sir Francis Walsingham, after whose death he succeeded to the place of principal secretary of state. He was made chancellor of Lancaster 1597, and afterwards succeeded his father lord Burleigh as prime minister, and in this high and dangerous office behaved with great prudence and sagacity. The influence which he possessed under Elizabeth, he retained in the next reign, and James was so pleased with the conduct of this minister, that he created him earl of Salisbury in 1605, and made him knight of the garter. On the death of lord Dorset 1608, he succeeded to the office of high treasurer, and applied his great talents to restore the finances of the kingdom to a more regular and improving state. He died of the complicated attacks of the dropy and scurvy, 24th May, 1612. His opposition to the earl of Essex who at last ended his life on the block, is exposed to reprehension; but his enmity to the virtuous Raleigh continued with increasing asperity, renders his character on that subject peculiarly odious and criminal. He was deformed it is said in his person, but the energies of his mind made sufficient amends for the defects of personal appearance.

SALLENGRE, Albert Henry de, a learned writer, born at the Hague 1694. He was educated at Leyden, and became an advocate of the court of Holland, and afterwards commissary of the finances of the States

General; but his further and deserved advancement was stopped by the small pox, which carried him off 1723, aged 30. He was much respected by the literati of England and France, whom he visited, and was author of Memoirs of Literature, 2 vols. — History of Montmaur, 2 vols. 12mo. — Novus Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum, 3 vols. fol. — Essay on the History of the United Provinces, 4to. which was part only of a larger work which he did not live to complete.

SALLO, Denis de, a French writer, born at Paris 1626. Though dull in his youth, his powers gradually expanded, and he became an acute classical scholar, and in 1652, was admitted counsellor of the parliament of Paris. He did not, however, abandon literature, but was the first who, in 1664, formed the project of a "Journal des Sçavans." But so severe were his censures on the labors of his contemporaries, that a croud of enemies rose up against him, and he dropped in dismay his critical remarks. The plan nevertheless was adopted by the learned of Europe after his example, but with more moderation, and consequently greater success. He died 1669, and though an author of some ability, he is remembered now only as the inventor of a scheme of periodical criticism, which has proved so useful and so entertaining to the polished nations of the world.

SALLUST, Caius Crispus, a celebrated Latin historian. He was in the early part of life so debauched, that his name was erased from the list of senators; but the friendship of Cæsar restored him to his dignity, and gave him the government of Numidia, where he amassed an opulent fortune. He built some stately edifices at Rome, which still bear his name. He died B. C. 34. Though devoted to luxury and voluptuous ease, he wrote valuable histories of the Jugurthine war, and of the Catiline conspiracy.

SALMANASAR, a king of Assyria, who invaded Samaria and put an end to the kingdom of Israel, by carrying the people into captivity. He was afterwards unfortunate in his attack upon the Tyrians, who defeated him by sea. He died about 714 B. C. after a reign of 14 years.

SALMASIUS, Claudius, or SAUMAISE, a most learned writer, born at Saumur, 1588, of a respectable family. He was educated under his father, who was a member of the parliament of Burgundy, and afterwards studied at Paris, and then passed to Heidelberg, where he publicly professed the protestant religion, which he had imbibed from the precepts and example of his mother. In this place he drew upon himself the admiration of the university by his learning and continued application, and proved himself deservedly to be what his friend, Isaac Casaubon, had described him, "ad miraculum doctus." His literary reputation was now such that he received pressing and most liberal invitations from Venice, from Oxford, and even from the pope; but these he declined, and settled in 1632 in Holland, where he succeeded Scaliger as professor at Leyden. In 1640, on the death of his father, he visited Burgundy, and received the strongest solicitations from Richelieu, and the offer of a pension of 12,000 livres a-year to settle in France; but this he again rejected, and preferred the independence and freedom of Holland to the servility of a courtier. In 1650 he visited Christina, queen of Sweden, who received him with great respect, and treated him with the most flattering marks of friendship. His reputation, in the mean time, suffered in the controversy which he had with Milton; for while he defended, at the request of the exiled family of England, the conduct and principles of Charles I. his antagonist brought against him, if not more learning, yet more wit, more fancy, and more poignancy of thought, so that the labors of the Englishman were read with more applause throughout Europe than the duller composition of the defender of royalty. He began, indeed, to answer Milton, but with slowness and a heavy heart, and it was said that he died of chagrin, at the superior powers of his opponent. It is, however, more probable, that his death was occasioned by drinking improperly the Spa waters. He died 3d Sept. 1653. His answer to Milton was published by his son. Salmasius was universally acknowledged to be the most learned man of his time. He was well acquainted with all the languages of Europe, and in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and the other oriental tongues, he was a most perfect master; but all these great qualities were tarnished by self love, by a fastidious disregard of others, and the most inveterate odium against all such as dared to controvert or differ from his opinions. His works are very numerous, the best known of which are his "Notæ in Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores — and Exercitationes Plinianæ in Solinum," besides good editions of Tertullian, Florus, Polyhistor, Simplicius on Epictetus — and treatises de Modo Ufurarum — de Re Militari Romanorum — de Hellenistica — de Fœnere Trapezetico, &c.

SALMERON, Alphonfus, a native of Toledo, who finished his studies at Paris. He was one of the first and of the most zealous followers of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the jesuits, and after travelling through Germany, Poland, the Low Countries, and Ireland, he appeared at the council of Trent, where he displayed his learning and eloquence. He afterwards was very active in the establishment of the jesuits' college at Naples, where he died 13th Feb. 1585, aged 69. He wrote Commentaries on the Scriptures, and other works, edited in 8 vols. folio, 1612.

SALMON, William, an eminent empiric, author of the Complete Physician, or Druggist's Shop opened, 8vo. — a large Herbal, 2 vols. fol. — Polygraphice, or the Art of Painting, a work of merit — treatise on Astrology, &c. He flourished about 1685.

SALMON, Nathanael, an antiquarian, born at Mepfall, Bedfordshire, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge. He entered into orders, but though he had taken the oaths to William, he refused to do it to Anne, and being thus driven from the church, he applied himself to physic, which he practised at St. Ives', Huntingdonshire, and Bishop's Stortford, Herts. He wrote a Survey of Roman Stations in Britain, 8vo. — a Survey of Roman Antiquities in the Middle English Counties, 8vo. — the History of Hertfordshire, folio — the Lives of English bishops from the Reformation — the Antiquities of Surrey, and of Essex. He died 1742.

SALMON, Thomas, brother to William, was a writer of reputation. He was author of the Present State of all Nations — a Geographical Grammar, 8vo. afterwards improved by Guthrie — the Chronological History of England, 2 vols. 8vo. — Examination of Burnet's History of his own Times, besides valuable assistance in the Universal History, &c. He died suddenly, April, 1743, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church.

SALONINA, wife of Gallienus, was a woman of great merit, as the friend of literature, and a benevolent princess. She was murdered with her husband, 268.

SALTER, Samuel, a learned divine, born at Norwich, and educated at the Charter-house, and Benet college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was appointed by sir Philip Yorke, afterwards lord Hardwicke, tutor to his children, and to this connection, so well deserved by his talents and attention, he was indebted for his preferment in the church. He obtained from Herring the Lambeth degree of D. D. 1751, and in 1754 was appointed preacher at the Charter-house, and in 1761 master, on the death of Dr. Bearcroft. He was besides prebendary of Norwich, and had some livings. He died May 2d, 1778, and was buried in the burial ground of the Charter-house. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a scholar, and popular as a preacher, and blessed with such a retentive memory, that he always delivered his sermons without even the use of notes. He printed some single sermons, &c. — an edition of his maternal grandfather, Dr. Jeffery's, tracts and sermons, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He was for some time the friend of Bentley, and some anecdotes of that celebrated critic are preserved from his papers, by Bowyer.

SALVATOR, Rosa, an Italian painter, born at Renessia, near Naples, 1615. His youth was dissipated, and passed frequently in the abandoned company of banditti, in whose wild and rugged retreats he imbibed that taste for rough scenery which he described on canvas with so masterly a hand. His human figures are much admired, but few of his larger works are to be found in England, though he was so rapid in his execution, that he often began and finished a picture in one day. His prints, of which he etched a great number, are in general esteem. He distinguished himself also as a poet, and deserved, by the force and popularity of his satire, to be called the Juvenal of Italy. His works were printed, Amsterdam, 1719, 8vo. He died at Rome, 1673.

SALVI, John, an historical painter, who displayed great taste and judgment in copying the pieces of the best masters. He was born near Urbino, and died 1590, aged 86.

SALVI, Nicholas, an architect, born at Rome. He died 1751, aged 52. The best known of his works is the fountain of Crevi, which he finished at the desire of pope Clement XII.

SALVIANI, Hippolitus, a noble native of Citta-di-Castello, who practised medicine at Rome, and died there 1572, aged 59. He is author of a treatise on Fishes, folio — de Crisibus ad Galeni Censuram — poems and comedies in Italian.

SALVIANUS, a divine of the fifth century. He wrote, in an elegant style, a treatise on Divine Providence, and other works, printed, 2 vols. 8vo. 1623. He was a native of Cologne, and died at Marseilles, 484.

SALVIATI, Francis, a painter of Florence, born 1510. He was patronized by cardinal Salviati, and in consequence of this he exchanged his name of Boffi for that of his benefactor. He was at Paris 1554, but looked with envy upon the eminence of rival painters, and afterwards returned to Italy. He was much admired for the grace which he gave to his naked figures, and the beauty and ease of his draperies. The best of his pieces are preserved at Florence, Venice, and Rome. He died 1563.

SALVIATI, Joseph, a Venetian painter, who exchanged his family name of Porta for that of his master Salviati. His design and coloring were highly admired, and his abilities were frequently employed by the Venetians, with those of Tintoret and Paul Veronese. He died at Venice, 1585.

SALVINI, Anthony Marie, an eminent scholar, born at Florence, and professor of Greek there. He was member of the de la Crusca academy, and contributed much to the completion of their Dictionary, in 6 vols. folio. Besides elegant poetical translations into Italian of the Iliad and Odyssey, of Theocritus, Hesiod, Anacreon, and other Greek poets; besides Ovid's Metamorphoses, Horace's Satires and Art of Poetry, and other Latin works, and Boileau's Art of Poetry, and Addison's Cato, &c. he wrote some elegant sonnets — Academical Discourses — a Funeral Oration for Magliabechi, &c. He died at Florence, 1729.

SAMBUCUS, John, a native of Tirnau in Hungary, who studied medicine and improved himself by travelling through Germany, Italy, and France. He was patronized by the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. and was appointed counsellor of state and historiographer of the empire. He wrote Lives of the Roman Emperors — History of Hungary — Emblemata — Icones Medicorum, folio — translations in Latin from Hesiod, Plato, Thucydides, &c. This learned and well informed man died of an apoplexy at Vienna, 13th June 1584, aged 53.

SAMPSON, William, author of the Vow Breaker, a tragedy, lived in the age of the first Charles. He also assisted Markham in the composition of his tragedy of Herod and Antipater.

SAMPSON, Henry, M. A. a native of South Leverton, Notts, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He obtained the living of Framlingham, but was ejected for non-conformity at the restoration, and then studied physic at Leyden and Padua, and practised with success in London. He died 1705. He published an edition of Porter on Divine Grace, and prepared materials for a history of non-conformists, which, however, he never published.

SAMSON, son of Manoah, of the tribe of Dan. He is celebrated in scripture for his extraordinary strength, which he displayed against the enemies of his country. He was at last betrayed by his mistress, Delilah, into the hands of the Philistines, who put out his eyes, and made him work in a mill. He avenged himself on his enemies when they had assembled to make sport of him, and while in the temple of Dagon, he seized the pillars against which he rested, and throwing down the whole edifice, perished in the ruins, with 3000 of the Philistines, B. C. 1117.

SAMUEL, a celebrated prophet of Israel. He was early devoted to the service of God in the Temple as the attendant upon Eli, and when called to the holy office of prophet, he anointed Saul, and afterwards David, to be kings over his nation. He died about 1057, aged 98. The book of Judges and of Ruth are supposed to be written by him.

SAMWELL, David, a native of Nantglyn, Denbighshire, known as the surgeon of the Discovery, at the time when the unfortunate Cook was murdered by the natives of Owhyhee. As he was present at this dreadful scene, he gave to the public a very circumstantial account of it. He also published some poems in Welsh, and died 1799.

SANADON, Noel Stephen, a learned jesuit, born at Rouen, 1676. He taught with reputation at Caen, and afterwards, with equal success, was professor of rhetoric at Paris. He was intrusted with the education of prince de Conti, and made librarian to the king. He died 21st Sept. 1733. He was author of some orations and poems, much admired, besides a translation of Horace's works, accompanied with learned notes, the best edition of which is that of Amsterdam, 1735, in 8 vols. 8vo. containing Dacier's version and notes.

SANCHEZ, Antonio Nunes Ribeiro, a learned physician, born 7th March, 1699, at Penna-Macor in Portugal. He studied at Coimbra and Salamanca, and afterwards passed to London, and then visited Leyden, where he further improved his knowledge under the direction of Boerhaave. When in 1731, Anne, empress of Russia, required of that illustrious professor to recommend her three physicians, Sanchez was honorably nominated one of the number. In this distant country he was appointed physician to the army, and he distinguished himself by his extensive and successful practice, and at last became first physician at court. The revolution of 1742, however, changed his prospects, and in the midst of the proscriptions which he daily witnessed, he had the good fortune to be permitted to leave the country. He retired to Paris, where he died 14th Oct. 1783. His correspondence with the learned was extensive, and his papers are now, it is said, in the hands of Dr. Andry. It is to be observed, that Catherine, when she ascended the Russian throne, rewarded his services to her subjects with an honorable pension of 1000 roubles. The works of Dr. Sanchez, are Dissertations on the Origin of the Venereal Disease — on Earthquakes — a Method of studying Medicine, &c.

SANCHEZ, Thomas, a learned jesuit, born at Corduba, duba, 1551. His reputation for chastity and mortification was very great. He died at Grenada, 19th May, 1610, and was buried with extraordinary magnificence. His works on the Decalogue, on Monastic Vows, &c. in 4 vols. folio, display great genius; but in examining the controversies concerning marriage, he has used language too often coarse and indelicate.

SANCHO II. surnamed the Strong, king of Castille, resented the division made by his father Ferdinand, of his dominions, and therefore, on his mother's death, he dethroned his brothers. Garcias was banished from Galicia, and Alphonfus quitted the throne of Leon, to end his days in a monastery. Sancho afterwards stripped his sisters of their patrimony; but in besieging Zamora, which belonged to the eldest, he was assassinated, 1072.

SANCHO, Ignatius, a negro of extraordinary character, born 1729, at sea, on board a ship in its passage from Guinea to Spanish America. He was baptized at Carthage, by the name of Ignatius, and when two years old was brought by his master to England, and given to three maiden sisters near Greenwich, who contemptuously bestowed on him the appellation of Don Quixote's squire. Though treated with harshness by his austere mistresses, he found a patron and a friend in the duke of Montague, and after that nobleman's death, he lived with the duchess in the capacity of butler, and at her decease, received from her bounty an annuity of 30l. A habit of low debauchery, however, and a fondness for gaming, soon ruined his little fortune, till at last reflection brought him back to his senses, and as he was very partial to theatrical representations, he presented himself, as a proper character, to pourtray the person of Othello and Oroonoko. The attempt did not, however, answer the public expectation; but though thus disappointed, a marriage with a respectable young woman, of West India origin, dictated to him the necessity of industrious and honest exertions. By the friendship of the Montague family, he was again placed above want, and settled in a small grocery shop, where his good conduct enabled him, in the enjoyment of domestic comforts, to provide a decent subsistence for himself and his numerous family. He died 15th Dec. 1780. This singular character, patronized by the great, by the duchesses of Queensbury and Northumberland, and noticed by the learned and the fashionable, by Sterne, Garrick, and others, was author of several letters, which possess great originality, and display strong powers of intellect, and which appeared for the benefit of his family under the benevolent care of Miss Crewe.

SANCHONIATHON, a Phœnician historian, who flourished about the time that Gideon judged Israel. Some fragments remain in Eusebius and Porphyry, of his History of the Antiquities of Phœnicia, which Philo of Byblos had translated into Greek.

SANCROFT, William, an eminent English prelate, born at Fressingfield, Suffolk, 1616. He was educated at Bury school, and Emanuel college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1642. He was ejected from his fellowship in 1649 for refusing to conform to the republican establishment, and then went over to the continent, where he continued till the restoration. He returned to England soon after Charles, and became chaplain to Cofin bishop of Durham, who gave him the valuable living of Houghton-le-Spring, and a prebendal stall. In 1662, he was elected master of Emanuel college, in 1664 made dean of York, and a few months after promoted to the deanery of St. Paul. In this new situation he contributed much to the repairing of the cathedral, and when it was destroyed by the fire of London, he gave 1400l. towards rebuilding it. In 1677 he was unexpectedly raised by Charles II. to the metropolitan see of Canterbury, and added dignity to that high station by his exemplary conduct and paternal care of the church. He attended his royal master in his last moments, and it is said, used great freedom of exhortation. Under his successor he evinced a strong attachment to the established church, by his opposition to popery, and he was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower in 1688. Though thus zealous against the papists, and one of those lords who declared for the prince of Orange, on James's abdication, yet he refused to wait upon the new made monarch, to whose elevation he had so powerfully concurred, and for this pusillanimous conduct he is deservedly censured by Burnet and others. This conduct, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance rendered him unpopular with the court, he was suspended and Tillotson in 1691 was appointed in his room. As he refused to leave Lambeth, he was cited before the court of Exchequer as an intruder, and now, finding all resistance vain, he retired to Fressingfield, where he lived for two years in obscurity, till an intermittent fever carried him off, 24th Nov. 1693. Though a man of great learning, he published little, which was a Latin dialogue against Calvinism, called the Predestinated Thief — Modern Politics, from Machiavel, Borgia, &c. besides sermons — Familiar Letters, &c. His MSS. were purchased for 80 guineas, and presented to the Bodleian library by bishop Tanner.

SANCTORIUS, an ingenious physician, professor at Padua, was born at Capo d'Istria, 1561, and died at Venice, 1636. He is chiefly known for his curious experiments on insensible perspiration, which he made on himself in his statical chair, ascertaining, with incredible accuracy, what he gained by aliment, and what he lost by secretion and other discharges. This ingenious system was presented to the admiring world in his "Ars de Staticâ Medicinâ," Venice, 1614, translated into French, 1722, and into English by Dr. Quincy. He published besides, Methodus vitandorum Errorum in Arte Medicâ, 4to. — Commentaria in Galeni, &c. all together collected in 4 vols. 4to.

SANDBY, Thomas, a native of Nottingham, who acquired some celebrity as an architect, and was appointed professor of that science in the Royal academy, London. He died 1798, aged 77.

SANDEMAN, Robert, a Scotchman, born at Perth, 1723, and educated at St. Andrew's. Instead of entering into the church, for which he was intended, he became a linen manufacturer, and afterwards turned preacher. In 1762 he came to London, and made converts, and then passed to America, where he had a meeting-meeting-house. He died in New England, 1772. His sect still bears his name. He wrote an answer to Hervey's Theron and Aspasio, very offensive to the Calvinists.

SANDERS, Robert, an English writer, born near Breadalbane, in Scotland, about 1727. From a comb-maker he became a hackney writer, when transplanted to London, and besides engagements in some periodical publications, was amanuensis to lord Lyttelton, when he wrote his History of Henry II. He wrote the Complete English Traveller, folio — the Newgate Calendar — Gaffer Grey-beard, a novel, in 4 vols. 12mo. in which he occasionally employs his wit with effect against fanaticism. In his last years he projected a Chronology of all Nations, but died before its completion, of a disorder on his lungs, 19th March, 1783.

SANDERS, Nicolas, divinity professor at Louvain, was born at Charlewood, Surrey, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, from which he was banished for his religious tenets. He was with cardinal Hosius, at the council of Trent, and afterwards went to Poland, and he was sent by Gregory XIII. as his nuncio to Ireland, where he led for some time a wandering life in the woods and mountains during the civil troubles, and at last died of want, 1581. He wrote against the reformation, De Origine & Progressu Schismatis Anglicani, 8vo.

SANDERSON, Robert, an eminent prelate, born at Rotherham, Yorkshire, 19th Sept. 1587. After receiving his education at Rotherham school, he entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1606. In 1618 he was presented to the living of Wybber-ton, near Boston, which he resigned the next year, on account of the unhealthiness of the place, and then succeeded to Boothby Pagnel rectory, which he enjoyed for 40 years. He was afterwards promoted to a prebend of Southwell, and on account of his extensive learning, was recommended by Laud to the king, and made his chaplain. In 1636 he was created D. D. at Oxford, and in 1642, appointed regius professor of divinity, and canon of Christ-church. His attachment to the king rendered him an object of persecution with the parliament; but he adhered to his principles, and attended the king at Hampton-court, and the Isle of Wight, and advised him with respect to the proposal of the parliament, to alter, and even abolish the episcopal government of the church, and also published his sentiments under the title of Episcopacy, not prejudicial to regal power. In 1648 he was ejected from his professorship, but permitted to retain, though with difficulty, his living; and at the restoration, he was re-instated to all his ecclesiastical honors, and soon after raised to the see of Lincoln. Though he held this new dignity but a little time, yet he assiduously was engaged in promoting the interests of religion, and in improving the poor vicarages of his diocese. He died 29th Jan. 1662-3, and was buried privately in Bugden church. As a divine and a scholar Sanderson was well versed in ecclesiastical and antiquarian history, and was considered as the ablest casuist of the times. He used to say that he read only three books, Aristotle's Rhetoric, Aquinas' Secunda Secundæ, and Cicero's works, especially his Of- fices, which he could repeat without book. The strong sense and manly diction of his writings have been deservedly admired. The chief of his works are "Logicæ Artis Compendium," 36 sermons, folio — Nine Cases of Conscience resolved — De Juramenti Obligatione — De Obligatione Conscientiæ, translated into English by Charles, during his confinement in the Isle of Wight — Pax Ecclesiæ, about predestination, &c. — Discourses concerning the Church, &c. — Lectures in the Divinity School, Oxford, &c.

SANDERSON, Robert, esq. F. A. S. usher of the court of Chancery, and clerk of the Rolls' chapel, distinguished himself as the laborious continuator of Rymer's Fœdera, from the 16th to the 20th volume. A new edition of Rymer appeared in 1727. Sanderson died 25th Dec. 1741.

SANDRART, Joachim, a German painter, born at Frankfort, 1606. He studied at Prague, Utrecht, London, Venice, and Rome. His abilities were noticed and rewarded by the king of Spain; but instead of living the whole of his life abroad, he returned to Frankfort, where he married, and afterwards settled at Nuremberg, where he established an academy of painting. He published some works on his art, the best known of which is the Lives of Painters, with their effigies, abridged from Vafari and Ridolfi. He died at Nuremberg, 1683.

SANDYS, Edwin, a distinguished prelate, born in 1519, in Lancashire, at Hawkhead, as it is supposed. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1547 was elected master of Catherine hall, and in 1553, vice chancellor. He was a strong advocate for the reformation, and therefore willingly seconded the views of Northumberland in proclaiming Jane Gray queen; but when two days after, the same nobleman yielding to the times, wished him to proclaim Mary, he boldly resisted. For this contumacy he was deprived of his honors, sent to the tower for seven months, and at last liberated with great difficulty. His attachment to the protestant cause was so zealous, that Gardiner meditated his ruin; but he escaped to the continent, where he continued till the accession of Elizabeth. On his return to England he was appointed one of the nine divines who were to dispute against nine catholics before the assembled parliament, and he was also named one of the commissioners for the revision of the liturgy, and the reformation of the church. He was raised to the see of Worcester, and in consequence of his great learning, was one of those employed in the translation of what is called the Bishops' Bible, in which he translated for his share, the books of Kings and Chronicles. In 1570 he succeeded Grindal in the see of London, and in 1576 was translated to York. His severity against the papists, in the cause of the reformation, was so great, that he created himself many enemies, and so resentful were some of these religious opponents, that they scrupled not to charge the bishop of adultery, by introducing, while he was asleep at an inn at Doncaster, the wife of the inn-keeper into his bed, and then exciting the husband, in pretended irritation, to chastise the violence offered to his honor. This infamous conspiracy was fully detected, and the accomplices, men of rank and fortune, were severely punished in the star chamber. The archbishop, thus persecuted and exposed during his active life to great obloquy and much contention, died 10th July, 1588, and was buried at Southwell. He was twice married, and by his second wife had seven sons and two daughters, from one of whom is descended lord Sandys. As a preacher, Dr. Sandys was much admired; 22 of his sermons were published in 4to. and some of his letters have also appeared in print.

SANDYS, for Edwin, second son of the archbishop, was born in Worcester-shire, 1561, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, under the celebrated Hooker. In 1581 he obtained a prebend in the church of York, and afterwards travelled into foreign countries, and published an Account of his Observations, under the title of Europæ Speculum. He resigned his prebend in 1602, and was knighted by king James, and employed by him in affairs of trust and importance with foreign states. He opposed in 1621, the measures of the court in parliament, for which he was imprisoned, but soon after set at liberty, by the interference of the commons. He died 1629, and was buried at Northbourne, in Kent. He left 1500l. to the university of Oxford, for the foundation of a metaphysical lecture. Some sacred hymns have appeared under his name, though some attribute them to another person of the same name.

SANDYS, George, brother to the preceding, was the seventh and youngest son of the archbishop, and was born at Bishopsthorp, 1577. In 1588 he entered at St. Mary hall, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, and in 1610 set out on his travels, and during an absence of two years, visited not only the chief countries of Europe, but the most celebrated places of the East, the Holy Land, Egypt, &c. He published on his return, an Account of his Travels, in folio, 1615, with plates, which was very popular, and was often reprinted. He was also distinguished as a poet, and translated in 1632, Ovid's Metamorphoses into English verse, in folio — besides the Psalms of David Paraphrased — Christ's Passion, a sacred drama, from Grotius, &c. He died at Bexley, in Kent, March, 1643, and was buried there. His learning and virtues have been commended not only by his contemporaries, Lucius, lord Falkland, and others, but by Dryden, who called him the best versifier of his age, and by Pope, who declared that English poetry owed much of its beauty to his translations.

SANNAZARIUS, James, an eminent Italian poet, born at Naples, 28th July, 1458. He was patronized by Frederic, king of Naples, and accompanied that prince into France, after his expulsion from his kingdom. He afterwards returned to Naples, where he devoted himself to study and to pleasure. He died 1530. His Latin poems, consisting of elegies, eclogues, and epigrams, have been often edited. His epic poem De Partu Virginis, in 3 books, is considered as an elegant and highly finished performance, though the mixture of christianity and paganism must be regarded as offensive to truth and probability. He wrote also two pieces in Italian, Arcadia, in prose and verse, and Rime, a poem.

SANSON, Nicolas, a French geographer, born at Abbeville, Dec. 12th, 1600. He early distinguished himself by his geographical labors, and was so indefatigable that he executed not less than 300 large maps of places, ancient and modern, in a correct and elegant manner. He was engineer and geographer to the king, and was patronized by Richelieu and Mazarine. He died at Paris, 1667, leaving two sons, who inherited his geographical talents. His Atlas was published, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1693. He wrote besides treatises on the Four Parts of the World — a Description of the Roman Empire, France, Spain, Italy, &c.

SANSOVINO, James, called FATTI, a native of Florence, eminent as a sculptor and architect. The mint, the library of St. Mark, and the palace of Cornaro, at Venice, are beautiful specimens of his skill and genius, which were so highly admired, that in a public tax he and Titian were exempted from the general contribution. He died at Venice, 1570, aged 91. His son Francis was born at Rome, 1521, and studied at Venice, but took his degrees in law at Padua. He, however, abandoned jurisprudence for polite literature, and erected a printing house at Venice, where he printed his own works, and those of others. He wrote a Chronology of the World, to 1582 — a Translation of Plutarch — Annals of the Ottoman Empire — Description of the Government of Genoa, Lucca, and Ragusa — a collection of 100 novels of illustrious Italian writers, &c. He died at Venice, 1586, aged 65.

SANTEUL, John Baptist de, a Latin poet, born at Paris, 1630. He was one of the canons of St. Victor, and was rewarded for his merits with a pension from Lewis XIV. He died at Dijon, 1697. His Latin poems were much admired, and appeared in 3 vols. 12mo. — besides Latin Hymns, in another volume. Bruyere has spoken of him in high strains of commendation. His brother Claude, who died 1684, also excelled as a Latin poet.

SANTI DI TITI, a native of Florence, whose historical pieces and portraits were much admired. The best part of his works are preserved at Florence. He died 1603, aged 65.

SAPOR I. king of Persia after his father Artaxerxes, A. D. 238. He extended his dominions by the conquest of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia, and by the defeat of the emperor Valerian. He was afterwards defeated by Odenatus, and some time after put to death by his subjects, 273.

SAPOR II. king of Persia after his father Hormisdas, was a brave and successful warrior against the Romans, but a violent oppressor of the Christians. He died 380 A. D.

SAPPHO, a celebrated poetess, born in Mitylene, about 600 B. C. Her poetical powers in lyric composition were so respectable, that she was called the tenth muse, and her countrymen even stamped her image on their coin. Her manners, however, were dissolute, and it is said that she threw herself into the sea, on account of the coldness with which young Phaon returned her love.

SARASIN, John Francis, a French writer, born at Hermanville, near Caen, 1604. He studied at Caen and Paris, and though not very learned, was eminent for for his vivacity, his wit, and his acquaintance with polite literature. He was made secretary to the prince of Conti; but though long protected and favored by him, he was at last dismissed from his service with ignominy, because he had prevailed upon him, through interested motives, to marry cardinal Mazarine's niece. This severe treatment weighed heavily upon his spirit, and at last occasioned his death, 1654. His works were published under the care of his friend Menage. They are in French, and consist of a Discourse on Tragedy — History of the Siege of Dunkirk, 1649 — the Funeral Pomp of Voiture — Miscellanea — besides poems, odes, eclogues, epigrams, &c.

SARAVIA, Adrian, a native of Hesdin, in Artois; protestant professor of divinity at Leyden, where he joined the conspiracy for delivering up the city to Robert de Leicester. Upon the failure of this plan he fled to England, where he became canon of Canterbury, and the friend of Hooker, whose last moments he attended. His works have been collected into one vol. folio. He died 1611, aged 81. He is represented by P. Burman, as avaricious, inconstant, and ambitious.

SARBIIEWSKI, Mathias Casimir, a jesuit, Vid. CASIMIR.

SARDANAPALUS, a dissolute king of Assyria. When defeated in an insurrection of his subjects, who viewed with indignation, his effeminate conduct, he set his palace on fire, and perished in the flames, B. C. 820.

SARISBURY, John of, an English ecclesiastic, born at Rochester, 1110. He was the favorite of Henry II. and of Thomas Becket, and for some time was the English resident at the court of Rome. He was afterwards the friend and faithful companion of Becket, and was with him when he was assassinated at Canterbury. He then passed over to France, and was made bishop of Chartres, 1179, but died soon after. He was a man of great genius and extensive learning, which he showed in a Latin treatise called Poliraticon, five de Nugis Curialium, &c. — besides his "Letters," — a Life of Becket — a treatise on Logic and Philosophy, much commended by Du Pin, and by Lipsius.

SARJEANT, John, a secular priest, whose real name was Smith, born in Lincolnshire, 1621, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became secretary to Morton, bishop of Durham; but afterwards went to Lisbon, and in the English college there, changed his religion. He returned to England, 1652, and wrote some tracts in favor of the new tenets which he had embraced, especially against Tillotson, Bramhall, Pierce, Hammond, &c. He died about 1670.

SARPI, Peter Paul, commonly known by the name of father Paul, was born at Venice, 14th Aug. 1552. At the age of 12 he entered into the order of the Servites, and soon acquired distinction by his learning and abilities. Well skilled in the knowledge of the learned languages, he was equally conversant in philosophy, mathematics, and theology, and had made some progress in medicine and anatomy. These high acquirements were noticed and rewarded; he was not only made provincial of his order, but was honored with the esteem of cardinals and of princes. The quarrels of Venice with pope Paul V. engaged the attention of Sarpi, and he so ably defended the rights of his fellow citizens, that the pope ordered him to come to Rome, and on his refusal excommunicated him. Undismayed by the displeasure of the pontiff, he did not cease to advocate the cause of Venice against foreign powers, in his speeches and in his writings; but his boldness proved almost fatal to him. He was attacked on the bridge of St. Mark by five assassins, who, after stabbing him in three places, escaped to a ten oared barge, which waited their arrival; and though the republic, incensed at the treatment of their brave defender, offered a high reward, the murderers were never discovered. The wounds were not mortal, but they hastened the dissolution of Sarpi, whose constitution was very delicate, and his health feeble. He died 14th Jan. 1623, aged 71, and his last words were, esto perpetua, expressive of his wish for the immortal glory of his country. This learned man wrote several works of merit, and his knowledge was so extensive, that the Italians have not hesitated to ascribe to him the discovery of the circulation of the blood. He was author of the History of the Council of Trent, a valuable work, printed in Italian, London, 1619, and Latin, 1620 — Considerations of the Censures of Paul V. against the Venetian Republic — treatise on the Interdict — De Jure Asylorum — treatise on the Inquisition — on Benefices — letters — Memoirs of his life appeared at Venice, 1766. His works were collected at Venice, 1677, in 6 vols. 12mo.

SARTO, Andrea de, an Italian painter, born at Florence, 1471, the son of a tailor, hence his name. He was first apprentice to a goldsmith; but he was born with a genius for painting, and by copying and imitating, at his leisure, the pieces of the greatest masters, and by the instruction of Basile, Cossimo, and Bigio, he soon acquired correctness and celebrity. He was invited by Francis I. to France, and received very honorable marks of the royal bounty; but when permitted to visit Florence, to make a collection of pictures to adorn the king's palaces, he not only shamefully forgot his promise, but dishonorably embezzled the money intrusted by the monarch to his care. This dishonorable conduct rendered him despised and poor; but he forgot himself for a while in the intoxication of unlawful pleasures, and died of the plague, 1520, aged 42. As an artist, he possessed superior powers, though his pictures are said to be deficient in boldness, in strength, and life.

SATURNINUS, a heretic of the second century. He supposed that the world was created by angels, and he regarded the connexion of the sexes as criminal.

SATURNINUS, Pub. Sempronius, a Roman general, who assumed the imperial purple, 263. He was murdered by his soldiers four years after. A general of Aurelian, of the same name, was proclaimed emperor by the Alexandrians, 280, and reluctantly accepted the honor, but soon after destroyed himself.

SAVAGE, Richard, an eminent English poet, natural son of Anne, countess of Macclesfield, by the earl of Rivers,

Rivers, was born 1698. Doomed to misery his infancy was entrusted to the care of a poor woman, by his unnatural mother, who wished not, indeed, to conceal her shame, but punish her offspring. His father was prevented from leaving him a legacy of 6000*l.* because the cruel countess declared that he was dead, and after thus robbing him of independence, she endeavoured to send him to the plantations, and then placed him apprentice to a shoe-maker in Holborn. The death of the nurse who had taken care of him, now altered his situation, and in searching the effects of a woman, whom he considered as his mother, Savage discovered letters which informed him of his real birth. Leaving, therefore, in disdain, his humble profession, he addressed himself to his mother, and tried by every art of tenderness and regard to awaken her affection. His appeals were in vain upon the obdurate heart of the countess, and therefore, as he had acquired some little learning at St. Alban's school, he commenced author to gain subsistence. But though noticed by the wits of the age, by sir Richard Steele, and by Wilks, Savage often passed his nights in the open fields, or in the streets, unable to pay even for an obscure lodging. His tragedy of sir Thomas Overbury, at last raised him to the short independence which could be gained from the profits of 200*l.*; but whilst he congratulated himself on his success, he had the misfortune in a drunken quarrel at a house of ill fame to kill one of his companions in debauchery, a Mr. Sinclair. He was tried for the offence, and found guilty, and it was now that he discovered his mother's cruel conduct. She not only rejoiced at his condemnation, but used all her influence to cause him to be executed, and her diabolical wishes would have been gratified, had not the countess of Hertford, out of compassion, reported to the queen the extraordinary sufferings of the condemned culprit, and procured his pardon. Thus, incapable of raising compassion in the breast of his mother, he thought he might extort money from her by the powers of ridicule, and he succeeded. Lord Tyrconnel received him, in consequence, into his family and friendship, and allowed him 200*l.* a-year. But the manners of Savage were licentious; he was fickle in his temper, violent and irascible, and he easily quarrelled with his patron, and was dismissed from his favor. His next effort for subsistence was the publication of his "Bastard," a poem of great beauty, and which grew so popular, that his mother, at that time at Bath, was obliged to fly from the place, to avoid hearing the lines, which were repeated on all sides, to create in her shame and confusion. His "Volunteer Laureat," on the queen's birth-day, procured him from the royal purse, a present of 50*l.* with a promise of the like annual sum; but the money was soon squandered, and the poet, left without resources, often quitted the house of a friend, where his wit and politeness procured him an invitation, to pass the night in the society of the meanest rabble, in the summer on heaps of rubbish, and in the winter among the ashes of a glass-house. The death of the queen, in 1738, brought on, with the loss of his pension, increasing poverty; yet his friends exerted themselves in his favor, and promised to raise 50*l.* a-year for him, if he would retire to Wales, and live there in privacy. He accepted the kind offer, and departed for his distant residence, but grew soon tired, and sighed for the dissipation of London. On his return he passed through Bristol, where his elegant manners, and pleasant conversation procured him admittance to the tables of the rich; but after a time his company grew disagreeable, from his late hours, and his irregularity of conduct. Poverty too increased his miseries; his clothes were now too shabby for genteel company, and at last he was arrested by the mistress of his coffee-house, for the small sum of 8*l.* Six months he languished in the confinement of a jail, when a fever came to terminate his wretched existence. He died 1st Aug. 1743, aged 46, and was buried in St. Peter's church-yard, at the expence of the gaoler. This unhappy man, whose character was so chequered with vices and good qualities, might have become, from the strong natural powers which he possessed, a most respectable member of society; but his mind was untutored, and the cruelty of his mother made him quarrel with the whole world, which he regarded with the consequence of persecuted virtue, and injured innocence. Whatever kindnesses he received he considered as due to his merits, and he seldom suffered the good opinion of a friend towards him, long to continue in his favor. His works, which display the power of a wild, but original writer, have been collected together by T. Evans, bookseller in the Strand, and published in 2 vols. 8vo. with the memoirs of his life by Dr. Johnson, who often shared his poverty, and was a witness to his sufferings, his follies, and his imprudence.

SAVAGE, John, D. D. president of the Royston club, and lecturer of St. George's, Hanover square, was made rector of Clothall, Herts, by lord Salisbury, whom he had attended on his travels. He was educated at Westminster, and ever after showed great fondness for the school. He died 24th March, 1747, and out of respect, the scholars of Westminster inscribed a small tablet to his memory, in the east cloisters of the abbey. He printed two occasional sermons.

SAVAGE, Samuel Morton, a dissenting divine, educated under Eames. He afterwards was assistant to Dr. Jennings, whom he quitted in 1785. He received the degree of D. D. from Aberdeen university, 1767, and died 1791, aged 70. He published some single sermons of little merit.

SAVARY, James, a French writer, born at Doué, in Anjou, 1622. He was employed in the first part of his life in commercial pursuits, and afterwards was admitted of the council for the reformation of commerce. As his knowledge on mercantile subjects was very extensive, he digested his ideas into a volume, which he published 1675, 4to. under the title of the "Parfait Negociant," a most useful work, translated into every language of Europe, and of which the eighth edition appeared with additions by his son Philemon Lewis, 1721. He further published a supplementary volume in 1688, and died 1690. He had 17 children by one wife, and 11 survived him. Two of these sons, James and Philemon, labored together to complete that useful work, the Universal Dictionary of Commerce, which was published, 2 vols. folio, 1723, and again in 3 vols. fol. 1748. James died 1716, and Philemon, 1727.

SAVARY, M. a French writer, born at Vitre, in Brittany. He studied at Rennes, and in 1776, travelled into Egypt, where he continued three years, earnestly attentive to the manners and habits of the inhabitants, and to the antiquities of the country. On his return he visited the islands of the Archipelago, and in 1780, published a translation of the Koran, and afterwards produced his "Letters on Egypt," 2 vols. 8vo. a popular work, translated into various European languages. He published also Letters on Greece. He was a man of good talents and refined taste, but too warm an imagination for the soberness of an historian. He died 1788, at Paris.

SAVERY, Roland, a celebrated landscape painter, born at Cambray. He died 1639, aged 63.

SAVILLE, sir Henry, a learned Englishman, born at Bradley, near Halifax, Yorkshire, 30th Nov. 1549, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He early distinguished himself as an excellent classical scholar, and after travelling on the continent, was made tutor, in the Greek language, to queen Elizabeth. In 1585 he was appointed warden of Merton, over which society he presided with great dignity 36 years, and in 1596 he was advanced to the provostship of Eton college. He was as great a favorite with James as he had been with Elizabeth; but he declined all offers of promotion either in church or state, and was satisfied with the honor of knighthood conferred, 1604. Upon the loss of his son, he devoted all his property and his time to the encouragement of learning, and with commendable munificence, founded in 1619 two professorships at Oxford, one in astronomy, and the other in geometry, and bestowed various sums of money, and also lands, for other benevolent purposes of improvement in the university, besides some valuable books to the Bodleian. This amiable man died at Eton college, 19th Feb. 1621-2, and was buried in the chapel there. His character has been deservedly applauded by his learned contemporaries, by H. Casaubon, Jos. Scaliger, Mercerus, Meibomius, Montagu, &c. and the university of Oxford, in a public speech, paid also the highest honors to this their worthy benefactor. His works are four books of Tacitus' history, and the Life of Agricola, translated into English, fol. with notes — Commentaries concerning Roman Warfare — a Latin Collection of Ancient Writers of English History, with a Chronological Table from J. Cæsar to William the Conqueror — St. Chrysostom's Works in Greek, 8 vols. folio, a valuable edition which cost him 8000l. in the publication. He published besides, Bradwardin's de Causâ Dei — Prælectiones, 13 in Euclid, &c. His brother Thomas was fellow of Merton, and afterwards of Eton, and distinguished himself for his learning, and his intimacy with Camden, &c. He died in London. 1592-3.

SAVILLE, sir George, marquis of Halifax, an eminent statesman, descended from a Yorkshire family, and born 1630. He contributed greatly to the restoration, and was rewarded for his services with a peerage. In 1672 he went as ambassador to Holland, with Arlington and Buckingham, to treat about a peace with France, but with little success; and in 1675 he was removed from the council board for opposing the test bills, and the declaration for a toleration, by the influence of the duke of York, whose measures he warmly reprobated as hostile to the constitution. He was, however, so violent against the exclusion bill, that the commons addressed the king to remove him from his council, to which he had lately been restored, but his firmness prevailed; the parliament was dissolved, and he was raised to the dignity of an earl, and refused the office of secretary of state, and of lord lieutenant of Ireland. In 1682 he was created a marquis, and made privy seal, and on James's accession, he was appointed president of the council; but when he refused to consent to the repeal of the test act, he was dismissed by the king from all his offices. When James abdicated the crown, Halifax was made president of the lords, and in the convention parliament, was appointed speaker of the upper house, and vigorously supported the elevation of the prince of Orange to the vacant throne, and for his services was nominated privy seal. In 1689 he quitted the court, and ever after displayed a strong and determined opposition to the measures of the ministry till his death, which happened in April, 1695, occasioned by a gangrene in a long neglected rupture. Halifax was a man of great abilities as a statesman and a speaker, but the soundest arguments and the most solid truths, were too often turned into contempt by the force of ridicule, and a vicious propensity to low and vulgar wit, which he was eager on all occasions to show. Though reputed an atheist by the world, he confessed to Burnet, who attended his last moments, his firm belief in the goodness of God, and the mediation of Christ. His titles were extinct by the death of his only surviving son in 1700. He was an elegant writer, and besides his valuable "Advice to a Daughter," he published the Character of a Trimmer — the Anatomy of an Equivalent — a Letter to a Dissenter — Maxims of State — the Character of king Charles II. &c.

SAUL, son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was anointed king of Israel by Samuel, 1095 B. C. He disobeyed the command of God by sparing the Amalekites and Philistines, who were devoted to destruction, and Samuel told him that the kingdom would be removed from his family. He was very jealous of the great popularity of David, who had killed the giant Goliath, and who was doomed to succeed him. He killed himself after an unfortunate battle at Gilboah.

SAUNDERS, Charles, a dramatic writer in the age of the second Charles. His abilities displayed themselves so early, that while at Westminster school, he wrote the play of Tamerlane the Great. Little is known of the particulars of his life.

SAUNDERS, sir Edmund, from a common beggar, rose to eminence in the law, by the friendship of a lawyer of Clement's inn, who saw and patronized his abilities by admitting him among his clerks. From a clerk he became a counsel, and at last was appointed chief chief justice of the King's Bench, where he supported the dignity of his office by patience, integrity, and impartiality. He died 1683.

SAUNDERS, Richard, author of Astrological Judgment and Practice of Physic, 4to. &c. — Physiognomy and Chiromancy, &c. folio, obtained some celebrity in a credulous and superstitious age, and died 1680.

SAUNDERSON, Nicolas, a celebrated mathematician, born at Thurlston, Yorkshire, 1682. When 12 months old, he was deprived of his sight by the small-pox, and therefore retained no idea whatever of light and of colors. His education, however, was not neglected; at Penneston grammar school he acquired such knowledge of the classics, that he could most perfectly understand Euclid, Archimedes, and Diophantus, when read in Greek. His fondness for mathematics began to appear when first he was made acquainted by his father with numbers, and soon, by the power of his memory, he formed intricate calculations, and resolved difficult problems. The friendship of Mr. West, who observed his unusual powers, initiated him into the knowledge of algebra and geometry, and under the further assistance of Dr. Nettleton, he acquired all that correctness, and that vast information which raised him to such celebrity. He afterwards improved his knowledge of logic and metaphysics at a private school near Sheffield, and at the age of 25 appeared at Cambridge, as a resident in Christ's college, though not a member of the society. His extraordinary powers, and the difficulties of a narrow fortune, however, procured him friends and admirers, and Whiston, the mathematical professor, very liberally permitted him to lecture before the university. His lectures were on the Newtonian philosophy, and were attended by crowded audiences, and so deservedly popular did he become, that on the removal of Whiston from his professorship, the blind lecturer was honorably called upon, by the wishes of all the university, to fill up the Lucasian chair, and a degree of M. A. by royal mandate was obtained, 1711, to qualify him for the office. His inauguration speech was delivered in elegant Latin, and his reputation continued to increase, so that when George II. visited the university, the professor was, by royal favor, created doctor of laws. This great character became, by close application, a valetudinarian, and at last was attacked by a mortification in his foot, which carried him off, 19th April 1739, aged 57. He was buried at Boxworth, Cambridgeshire, the rectory of Mr. Dickens, his father-in-law, by whose daughter he had a son and a daughter. The vivacity and wit of his conversation were much admired; but his judgment of persons and things was often expressed with such freedom, and such unconcern, that he created himself many enemies. This singular character had astonishing powers of feeling; when in a garden, where observations were making on the sun, he could point out every cloud that obscured the sky, and he discovered such quickness in observing the voice of persons with whom he conversed, that he recollected every one with the most singular exactness. He was a great proficient in playing on the flute, and cultivation was only wanting to have made him as great in music as in mathematics. His Elements of Algebra were published at Cambridge, by subscription, 1740, 2 vols. 4to. and a treatise on Fluxions, 8vo. appeared also after his death. It is needless to say that he was the friend of the great men of his times, admired and respected by them, and repaying their esteem by the strongest gratitude. Of Sir Isaac Newton, whom he knew intimately, he always spoke in a style almost bordering on veneration.

SAVONAROLA, Jerom, an Italian monk born at Ferrara, 1492. He entered into the Dominican order at Bologna, and became an eloquent and popular preacher, after teaching for some time physics and metaphysics. His influence in the pulpit was so great at Florence, that for some years he guided the state as its sovereign; but when he inveighed against the corruptions of the church of Rome, and the scandalous life of the pontiff Alexander VI. he drew down upon him the vengeance of the holy see, which neither his popularity, nor the purity of his morals could avert. He was condemned to be hanged and burned, and suffered that dreadful punishment in 1498 with great resignation. He wrote sermons — the Triumphs of the Cross, and various other theological works, printed Leyden, 6 vols. 12mo. J. Fr. Picus, of Mirandula, has written his life.

SAVOR, Lewis, a native of Saulieu in Burgundy, who studied medicine, and became physician to Lewis XIII. He also applied himself to antiquarian pursuits. His works are, Discourse on Ancient Medals, 4to. — French Architecture in Private Buildings, a work of merit, 4to. — Galen's Art of Healing by Bleeding, from the Greek — de Causis Colorum, 8vo. He died 1640, aged 61.

SAURIN, James, son of a protestant lawyer, was born at Nismes, 1677. He left France with his father on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and went to Geneva, where he studied with great assiduity, and afterwards served as a cadet in Lord Galloway's regiment in the campaign of 1694. He, however, abandoned the military life for philosophy and divinity, and after improving himself further at Geneva, he passed, in 1700, into Holland and England, and in 1703 married. In 1705 he settled at the Hague, where his eloquence as a preacher was displayed with astonishing effect to crowded audiences. He died at the Hague, 30th Dec. 1730. He wrote a treatise on Education, dedicated to the princes, sons of George II. and was rewarded with a pension by the princess of Wales. He published besides, his sermons, highly esteemed, in 12 vols. 8vo. which have been translated into English by Robinson and Hunter; but his greatest work is Discourses Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most memorable Events of the Old and New Testament, left incomplete, but afterwards continued in 6 vols. folio. He was unfortunately engaged in a controversy with la Chapelle and others, for asserting in a pamphlet that, in some cases, truth may be disguised, and though a strong friend to toleration, he was severely treated by his antagonists.

SAURIN, Joseph, a French mathematician, born at Cour-

Courtufon, in the principality of Orange, 1659. He was a protestant, but afterwards abjured his principles at Paris, and was admitted member of the academy of sciences, and received a pension from the king. He devoted his life to geometrical pursuits, and communicated some valuable papers to the Memoirs of the academy, and the Journal des Sçavans. He was engaged in a controversy with Rousseau, who had falsely charged him with writing some libellous verses against some persons of distinction, which he himself, it is supposed, had composed; a scandalous conduct, which, when examined, proved the innocence of Saurin, and the guilt of Rousseau. Voltaire has vindicated his memory, but still his character must be considered as violent and unbending. He died at Paris, 1737.

SAURIN, Bernard Joseph, son of the preceding, was advocate of the parliament of Paris, and member of the French academy. He disregarded the law for literature and poetry, and became the friend of Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Helvetius. He wrote some plays of great merit and popularity, especially Spartacus, Blanche and Richard, tragedies — Anglomanie, a comedy — the Marriage of Julia — Mœurs du Temps, &c. His dramatic pieces were collected in 2 vols. 8vo. 1783. He was so much esteemed by Helvetius that the philosopher allowed him a handsome pension. He died at Paris, 17th Nov. 1781.

SAUSSURE, Nicolas de, a native of Geneva, member of the council of 200, and distinguished by his writings on agriculture. He is author of Essays on the Vine — on the Scarcity of Wheat — on Dew — on Fire, &c. He died 1790, aged 81.

SAUSSURE, Horace Benedict de, son of the above, was born at Geneva, 17th Feb. 1740. From his earliest years he evinced great partiality for literature, especially natural history, and at the age of 21 he was elected to the chair of philosophical professor at Geneva, which he filled with great public advantage for 25 years. He first visited Paris in 1768, and afterwards examined the discoveries of Montgolfier at Lyons, and after travelling through Holland, Belgium, and England, he, in 1772, extended his philosophical researches to Italy. He visited the island of Elba, and with sir William Hamilton, examined the wonders of Vesuvius, and afterwards measured the crater of Etna. In the progress of his important researches, he discovered some valuable plants, and also invented various instruments, very useful in the operations of science and of art. His next excursions were on the Alps, and after crossing them 14 times by eight different places, he ascended, through a thousand difficulties, to the summit of Mont Blanc, where he could scarce breathe. These laborious exertions in the cause of science, rendered him deservedly popular; he was made member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of other learned bodies, and the emperor Joseph, when he visited Geneva, paid particular attention to the philosopher. In the French revolution, he was elected, on the union of his country to France, to the national assembly; but the disorders which prevailed not only ruined his little fortune, but broke his heart, and he died of chagrin, 1799. He is author of an Eulogy on his friend Bonnet, 8vo. — Dissertatio Physica de Igne — Inquiry on the Bark of Leaves, &c. Dissertatio Physica de Electricitate, 8vo. — Plan of Reform for the College of Geneva — Description of the Electrical Effects of Thunder — Essay on Hygrometry, 4to. — Voyages in the Alps, 4 vols. 4to. a most valuable work, and various communications to the memoirs of the learned societies of which he was a member.

SAUVAGES, Francis Boissier de, a native of Alais, who applied himself to medical pursuits, and became professor of botany and medicine at Montpellier, and member of several of the learned societies of France, and of foreign nations. His reputation was so extensive, that he was consulted from all parts of France, and he received the merited surname of the Boerhaave of Languedoc. This able and respected physician died at Montpellier, 19th Feb. 1767, aged 61. He wrote Theoria Febris — Nosologia Methodica, 5 vols. 8vo. — Physiologiae Mechanicae Elementa, 12mo. — Methodus Foliorum, 8vo. — a translation of Hales' Statistical Essays on Animals, &c. — Dissertations — Memoirs, &c.

SAUVAL, Henry, an advocate in the parliament of Paris. He is author of a laborious work, the History of the Antiquities of Paris, 3 vols. folio, on which he was engaged for 20 years, and which he did not live to complete. He died 1670, and in consequence of the death of his continuator, the work did not appear till 1724. It was again edited in 1733.

SAUVEUR, Joseph, a French mathematician, born at La Fleche, 1653. He was dumb till his seventh year, and then his powers of speech appeared very weak and imperfect, so that what he uttered was with difficulty and slowness. He had a strong propensity for mechanical knowledge, and disregarding the classical instruction which he received in the jesuits' college, applied himself to mathematical studies, against the wishes of his friends, who had marked out for him preferment in the church. To maintain himself, he began to teach mathematics, and so great was his reputation that at the age of 20 he had prince Eugene among his pupils. His abilities recommended him to the great and the learned; he was esteemed by Condé, honored with the notice of the royal family, and in 1686 was made professor of mathematics to the royal college, and in 1696 admitted member of the academy of sciences. He wrote a treatise on Fortification, and to enable himself to do it scientifically, he attended the siege of Mons. He wrote besides, a treatise on Music, and papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died 1716.

SAWYER, sir Robert, an eminent lawyer, attorney-general from 1681 to 1687. He was removed from his offices for refusing to lend his name to the arbitrary measures of James's government. He was a warm admirer and imitator of justice Hale, and died 1692.

SAXE, Maurice, count de, natural son of Frederic Augustus, elector of Saxony, and king of Poland, by the countess Konigsmark, was born at Dresden, 13th October, 1696. He showed fondness for war from his very infancy, and refused to undergo the labors of study,

Andy, except his application was rewarded with the permission of riding or of military exercise. His first campaign was in Flanders, under Eugene and Marlborough, where his valor was displayed at the taking of Lille, Tournay, and Mons, and at the battle of Malplaquet. When the king of Poland, in 1711, besieged the fortress of Stralsund, the young warrior appeared there to great advantage; he encouraged the soldiers by his example, and crossed the river in the fight of the enemy; and in the following dreadful battle of Guedelbusck, he had a horse shot under him, while he rallied three times the retiring troops. In 1717 he was with the emperor at the siege of Belgrade, where he defeated the Turks, and on his return, he was decorated with the order of the white eagle. After the treaties of Utrecht and Passarowitz, he went to France, where the duke of Orleans gained his attachment and services by bestowing on him the brevet rank of field marshal. During the peace of the continent, he laboriously employed himself in improving his mathematical knowledge, and in introducing strict military discipline in the regiment entrusted to his care; but in 1726 he was roused from his tranquil retirement by the states of Courland, who unanimously elected him their sovereign. Poland and Russia opposed his elevation, but he defended himself with bravery, and with a small force resisted with success thousands of his invaders; but at last he gave up the unequal contest, and abandoning the supreme power which his valor so much deserved, he retired, in 1729, to privacy in France. Here, during the attacks of a fever, he composed, in 13 nights, his Reveries, a work worthy of the pen of a Cæsar or a Condé, and valuable for the important instructions which it conveys to the general as well as to the soldier. The death of the king of Poland, his father, 1733, rekindled the flames of war through Europe, and Saxe prepared to share the dangers and the glories of the approaching campaign. He declined the command of the Saxon troops, offered him by his brother, the elector, and preferred serving in the French armies on the Rhine under marshal Berwick. He distinguished himself at the battle of Ettingen, and at the siege of Philippsburg, and for his services was rewarded with the rank of lieutenant-general. In the war which followed the death of Charles VI. Saxe gathered fresh laurels. He besieged Prague in 1741, and took it by assault, and soon after made himself master of Egra, and then marching to the Rhine, he seized the strong lines of Lauterburg. In 1744 he was made marshal of France, and entrusted with the armies in Flanders. Though ill, he immediately left Paris for his post, and opened the campaign of 1745 by the famous battle of Fontenoy, which he gained, though carried around his camp in a litter. This was followed by the fall of Tournay, Bruges, Ghent, Oudenarde, Ostend, and Brussels, and the next year another victory at Rocoux crowned his arms, and procured for him the most flattering honors from the king of France, and the title of marshal of all his armies, and of governor of the newly conquered countries. In the next campaign the victory of Lawfeldt was followed by the fall of Bergen-op-Zoom, and then of Maestricht, when the terrors of the Dutch arrested the career of the conqueror, and peace was concluded in 1748. After the peace Saxe visited Berlin, where he was received with all the honor due to his merits, and then he returned to France, where he devoted himself to literature and the arts. This great hero, whose celebrity was extended over the whole world, died 30th Nov. 1750, aged 54, and was buried in the Lutheran church of St. Thomas, Strasbourg. He had married the countess of Lobin, whom he divorced some time after from capricious motives, and he frequently repented of this conduct, as he possessed every amiable quality, and soon after gave her hand to a second and more constant husband. His eulogy, by M. Thomas, obtained the prize of the French academy in 1759. The best edition of his Reveries is in 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1757.

SAXO, Grammaticus, a celebrated writer, whose origin and even country is involved in obscurity. He is generally acknowledged to have been a native of Zealand an island of Denmark, and to have flourished in the 12th century. He studied theology, and was employed in the cathedral of Roschild, and went in 1161 to Paris, to invite some of the monks of St. Genevieve, to come and to reform the morals of the Danish priests. He died about 1208, aged upwards of 70, and was buried in Roschild cathedral, where, three centuries after, Lago Urne, bishop of Scalandra, placed an inscription on his tomb. By the encouragement of Absalom bishop of Roschild, Saxo undertook the History of Denmark and other Northern nations, and after 20 years of labor completed it in a manner worthy a man of learning and virtue. This valuable work was first published by Petrus at Paris, 1514, and reprinted at Basil and Frankfurt afterwards, and in 1644 at Sora, under the care of Stephanus.

SAY, Samuel, a dissenting minister, who after being engaged in various congregations in Norfolk and Suffolk, succeeded Dr. Calamy in 1734, at Westminster, where he died in St. James's street, 12th April, 1743, aged 68, of a mortification in his bowels. After his death appeared a thin 4to. volume of his poems with two prose essays on the harmony, variety, and power of numbers, exhibiting great taste, knowledge and judgment.

SCALA, Bartolomew, an Italian statesman, born about 1424. Though but the son of a miller, he rose to distinction at the bar, under the protection of Cosmo de Medicis at Florence. After the death of his patron he retained the same confidential offices with his successor Peter, and was employed by him in some important negotiations. He was for his services ennobled at Florence, and knighted by the pope, and made senator of Rome. He died at Florence 1497. He wrote the History of Florence in 20 books, of which four books only have been published, besides letters — a Speech made to Pope Innocent VIII. — pro Imperatoris Militaribus Signis, &c.

SCALA, Alexandra, daughter of the above, was distinguished for her knowledge of classical literature, as well as for her beauty, and her private virtues, which have been deservedly praised by Politian and others. Marullus married her, for the purpose of perfecting himself in the Latin language in her company. She died 1506.

SCALI-

SCALIGER, Julius Cæsar, a celebrated writer, born 1484, at Ripa in the territory of Verona, and descended from the princes of Verona. His father was in the military service of Matthias Corvinus king of Hungary, and at the age of 12 the son was presented to the emperor Maximilian, and continued as page about his person for 17 years. During his attendance on the emperor he was engaged in various expeditions, and was at the battle of Ravenna 1512, where he lost his father and brother. At the age of 40 he abandoned the military life, and after studying divinity, applied assiduously to medicine, and settled in 1526 at Agen, where though 45 he took for his wife a young girl of good family but scarce 16, with whom he lived 29 years, and by whom he had 15 children. In this retirement he devoted himself with uncommon application to literature and the modern languages, and while he practised physic for his maintenance, he acquired celebrity by the labors of his pen. He died of a retention of urine 1558, at Agen, where he was buried with this epitaph, Jul. Cæsar Scaligeri quod fuit. The abilities of Scaliger were undoubtedly great, but though commended by his son as a benevolent and amiable character, he was vain and petulant, and among others treated Erasmus with great virulence and illiberality, because he had ridiculed some of the learned men of Italy for their servile attachment to the Latinity of Cicero. The best known of his writings are, Exercitationes contra Cardanum de Subtilitate, 4to. — de Causis Linguæ Latinæ, 4to. — Poetices Libri septem, fol. — Poemata — Epistolæ — Commentarii in Theophrasti Libros — in Aristotelis Animal. fol. — in Hippocratis Librum de Insomniis, 8vo. — de Causis Plantarum, fol. — Animadversiones in Historiam Plantarum, 8vo. &c.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, son of the preceding, was born at Agen 1540. He studied at Bourdeaux and under his father; but after his death he passed to Paris to attend the lectures of Turnebus. His eagerness to improve, however, could not await the slow progress of regular lectures, and therefore he applied himself without the assistance of an instructor to Greek, and when a perfect master of the language he turned his attention to the Hebrew, and with such activity that he was well acquainted with 13 different languages. So much learning, to which was united a profound knowledge of the sciences, rendered his name very celebrated. He was invited to fill the chair of belles lettres at Leyden, in 1603, and he accepted the honorable appointment, and died there of a dropsy 21st Jan. 1609. Like his father, Scaliger possessed great abilities, but certainly superior learning, so that he was deservedly called the most learned man of the age; but these high qualities were obscured by a haughty deportment, and a contemptuous disregard of the merits of others, attended with abusive and illiberal language profusely directed against every opponent. The works of this extraordinary man are numerous and various, but the best known and the most useful is his "Opus de Emendatione Temporum," in which he not only displays vast erudition and an extensive knowledge of ancient writers, but lays the foundation of regular and systematic chronology, especially by the invention of the Julian period, and deserves the name which he has received, of the father of chronology. He wrote besides "Theaurus Temporum, &c." in which he corrected some of the errors of his former work — de Tribus Sæculis Judæorum, 2 vols. 4to. — Latin poems, 8vo. — Epistolæ, notes on Varro, and almost on all the authors of ancient Greece and Rome, containing various learned remarks, with bold, ingenious, and interesting conjectures. Two "Scaligerana," have appeared one at the Hague 1666, and the other at Groningen 1669.

SCAMOZZI, Vincent, a native of Vicenza, the most celebrated architect of his time. After travelling over France, Germany, and Hungary, to improve himself in the knowledge of his art he settled at Venice, which he adorned by the labors of his genius. One of the most remarkable of his works is the citadel of Palma in the Friuli. He wrote in Italian, Ideas on Universal Architecture in 10 books, which, however, did not receive his finishing hand, as he died before its completion 1616, aged 64. Of his valuable work only the first six books appeared in 2 vols. fol.

SCANDERBEG, or GEORGE CASTRIOT, king of Albania, was born 1404, and was delivered up by his father with three of his brothers, as hostages to Amurath II. emperor of the Turks. The three brothers were cut off by poison, and George was spared on account of his youth, and by his valor soon distinguished himself in the service of the bloody oppressor of his family. He was circumcised and took the command of a body of troops under the title of Sangiac; but on the death of his father 1432, he determined to recover the dominions of his ancestors. In the expedition with which he was entrusted against Hungary, he formed a secret correspondence with Huniades Corvinus the king of the country, and enabled him to defeat the Turks, 30,000 of whom fell in the field. After this he compelled the secretary of the sultan, who was in the camp, to write letters, sealed with the imperial signet, demanding the delivery of the capital of Albania into his hands. After the messengers were dispatched, he put to death all those who were witnesses of his measures, that no report might be carried to Amurath, and then hastening to Albania he was received as a deliverer by his countrymen, and acknowledged king 1443. In vain Amurath and his successor Mahomet made war against this enterprising hero, and besieged Croie his capital; their numerous armies were defeated, and after several years of hostility peace was restored in 1461, and the independence of Albania confirmed. At the request of Pius II. the Albanian monarch visited Italy, and not only relieved Ferdinand of Arragon who was besieged at Bari, but assisted him to defeat his victorious enemy the count of Anjou. Afterwards Scanderbeg was again engaged in war with the Turks, and his capital was twice besieged, but immediately relieved by his conquering arms. This heroic prince who had been present in 22 battles, and had killed 2000 Turks with his own hands without receiving only a slight wound, died at Lissa in the Venetian territories, 17th Jan. 1467, aged 63. His death was universally lamented, and the Turkish emperor bore witness to his bravery by dancing for joy at the intelligence that he was no more. Though occasionally severe, he was a man of mild manners, and of the most benevolent heart, and he exhorted earnestly his soldiers to chastity, observing that nothing was more prejudicial to their profession than sensual pleasures. His life was written by the jesuit du Pontet, 1709, in 12mo.

SCAPULA, John, a lexicographer who studied at Lausanne, and was afterwards engaged in the printing house of Henry Stephens. While thus employed, he privately made an abridgement of the great work which his master was preparing for the press, and by publishing it in 1580, under the title of a Greek Lexicon, he not only gained a considerable sum, but thus dishonorably ruined in some degree the laborious Thesaurus of Stephens, which when it appeared, found few purchasers. Stephens vented his indignation in the "Latinity of Lipsius," but found no other redress.

SCARBOROUGH, sir Charles, physician to Charles II. and his two successors, was eminent for his extensive practice, as well as for his knowledge of mathematics, in which he was so perfect that he could repeat in order all the propositions of Euclid, Archimedes, and other ancient authors. He was assistant and successor to Dr. Harvey, as lecturer on subjects of anatomy and surgery, and he was the first who judiciously applied mathematics to medical subjects. He wrote Syllabus Musculorum — an Elegy on Cowley, &c. and died 26th Feb. 1693.

SCARELLA, John Baptist, an ecclesiastic of Brescia, who warmly supported the principles of Newton's system. He wrote Physica Generalis, 3 vols. 4to. — de Rebus ad Scientiam pertinent. 2 vols. 4to. — de Magnetete, 4to. — Hydrodynamica, 4to. — Elements of Logic, Ontology, and Natural Theology, 4 vols. 4to. He died Feb. 1779, aged 70.

SCARRON, Paul, a burlesque writer, born at Paris 1610. Though deformed and in his manners very licentious, he was intended for the church by his father, who was a counsellor in the parliament, and a canonry at Mans was obtained for him. At the age of 27 he unfortunately lost the use of all his limbs, but in this helpless and deplorable state he indulged his propensity for humorous writings, and was universally courted for his wit and jocularities. Though his father had displeased Richelieu, yet the son recovered his esteem, by presenting to him a very humorous supplication. He married in 1651, Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, a lady of 16, afterwards so celebrated by the name of Maintenon, who thus early sacrificed her beauty, her person, and her liberty, to the caprices of a deformed and impotent invalid. Scarron died 1660. The pleasantry which enlivened his conversation was transfused into his writings, which were Virgil's Æneid travestied — the Comical Romance — comedies — a tragi-comedy, &c. which were all published at Paris 1685, and 1737, 10 vols. 12mo. and in 1786, in 7 vols. 8vo.

SCHAAF, Charles, a learned German, born at Nuys near Cologne, 1646. He was educated at Duisbourg, and became professor of oriental languages there, from which he removed in 1679 to Leyden, to fill the oriental chair. He died of an apoplexy at Leyden 1729. He wrote Opus Aramaicum, cum Gramma- tica Chaldaica & Syriaca, 4to. — Novum Testamentum Syriacum cum Versione Latina, 4to. — Lexicon Syriacum Concordantiale — Epitome Grammaticæ Hebraicæ, 8vo. — a letter in Syriac, &c.

SCHACHT, Christian Paul, a native of Harderwyck in Holland. He took his degrees of M. D. and became professor of medicine, botany, chemistry, and natural history, in his native place 1791, and died nine years after, aged 32. He is author of some valuable memoirs, &c. inserted in the Dutch journals.

SCHAGEN, Giles, a native of Alcmæer, who acquired great celebrity as a painter of portraits, and in historical subjects. He resided for some time at Paris, and died 1668, aged 52.

SCHALKEN, Godfrey, a Dutch painter, born at Dort 1643. He studied under Hoogstraten, and Gerard Douw, and chiefly excelled in painting candle light pieces. He was in London and drew William III. by candle light, and humorously made his majesty hold the candle. He was vulgar in his manners. He died at the Hague 1706.

SCHATEN, Nicholas, author of Historia Westphaliæ, fol. 1690 — Annales Paderbornenses, fol. — and a Dissertation on Charlemagne, was a German jesuit at the end of the 17th century.

SCHÉELE, Charles William, an eminent chemist, born at Stralsund 1742. He was member of the Swedish academy of sciences, of the medical society of Paris, and universally esteemed for his knowledge, and his chemical discoveries. He was first engaged with an apothecary who died much in debt; but the industry of the apprentice restored the prosperity of the house, and the widow pleased with his fidelity and character married him. But unhappily the day of the marriage, 17th May, 1786, proved the beginning of a fever which hurried him quickly to his grave. His valuable treatise on Air and Fire has been translated into French from the German, by Dietrich, in 12mo. and is deservedly known over Europe.

SCHÉELSTRATE, Emanuel de, a native of Antwerp, who became librarian of the Vatican, canon of St. John Lateran, and of St. Peter, at Rome. He died at Rome 5th April, 1692, aged 43. He wrote Antiquitates Ecclesiæ Illustratæ, 2 vols. fol. — Ecclesia Africana sub Primate Carthaginiensi, 4to. — Acta Constantinensis Concilii, 4to. — Acta Ecclesiæ Oriental. &c.

SCHÉFFER, John, a learned German, born at Stralsburg 1621. When driven by war from his country he went to Sweden at the invitation of queen Christina, and obtained the chair of eloquence and politics at Upsal. He was also librarian, and honorary professor of the law of nations in that university. He died there 1679. He published de Militiâ Navali Veterum — Upsalia Antiqua — Laponia, translated into English — Suecia Literata — de Re Vehiculari Veterum, besides notes on Phædrus, Ælian, and other classics.

SCHÉCKINS, James, a native of Schorndoff in the duchy of Wirtemberg, professor of philosophy and medicine at Tübingen. Though blind he pursued his favorite studies, and even refused to submit to an operation for the restoration of sight, observing that he wished to avoid seeing many odious and disagreeable objects. He wrote a dialogue, de Animæ Principatu

— a treatise de unâ Personâ & duabus Naturis in Christo, adversus Anti-Trinitarios — Refutatio Errorum Simonii, fol. 1573. He died at Tübingen 1587.

SCHEINER, Christopher, an able astronomer, rendered memorable for first discovering the spots on the sun's disc. He was born at Mecklenburg in Germany, and entered among the jesuits, and afterwards taught Hebrew and mathematics at Ingoldstadt, Brisac, Rome, &c. He was also counsellor to the archduke Charles, and died rector of the jesuits' college at Neisse in Silesia, 1650. His observation of the solar spots was at Ingoldstadt, 1611; but he was afraid to publish the discovery, which, however, Velferus to whom he communicated it, unhandsonely did, and Galileo himself laid claim, but improperly, to the merit of being the first observer. He published these phenomena in 1630, in folio, under the title of Rosa Urfina, containing accurate delineations of the spots.

SCHELHAMMER, Gouthier Christopher, a native of Jena, who was professor of medicine at Helmstadt, afterwards at Jena, and then at Kiel, and was physician to the duke of Holstein. He wrote Introductio ad Artem Medicam, 4to. and other medical works, and died 1716, aged 75.

SCHELLINKS, William, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter of landscapes, history, and sea views. His chief performance is said to be Charles II. embarking for England. He died 1678, aged 47. His brother Daniel excelled in landscapes. He died 1701, aged 68.

SCHENCK DE GRAFFENBERG, John, a physician, who was born at Friburg, and died there 12th Nov. 1598, aged 67. He was author of Observationum Medicarum, Rararum, Admirabilium & Monstrosorum, fol. edited by Spon. His son John George was also eminent as a physician, and settled at the Hague, where he died about 1620. He wrote de Formandis Medicinæ Studiis, 12mo. — Hortus Patavinus — Monstrorum Historia, 4to.

SCHENCKIUS, John Theodore, professor of medicine at Jena, died 1671, aged 52, author of Observations on Medicine, fol. and 8vo. — de Sero Sanguinis, 4to. — a Catalogue of the Plants of the Medical Garden of Jena, 12mo. &c.

SCHERTLIN, Sebastian, a native of the duchy of Wirtemberg, who first served in Hungary, and afterwards greatly distinguished himself at the defence of Pavia. At the taking of Rome and Narni, and in the defence of Naples 1528, he displayed such valor and intrepidity, that several potentates solicited his services; but he attached himself to the independence of Augsburg. He espoused the cause of the league of Smalkalde against the emperor, and afterwards passed into the service of France, and accompanied Henry II. in his expedition to the Rhine and the Low Countries. Charles V. afterwards restored him his property, which had been confiscated at Augsburg, and he distinguished himself in the service of the emperor Ferdinand I. and died 1577, aged 82, deservedly respected as a brave general.

SCHUCHZER, John James, a native of Zurich, who became there professor of mathematics and medicine. His reputation as a physician and a man of letters was such, that the Czar Peter made him liberal offers to settle in Russia; but the people of Zurich detained him by their generosity. He died in his native town 1733, aged 61. He published Natural History of the Bible in German, four large vols. fol. translated into Latin 1735, and into French 1734, but of this the original edition in German is the most valuable, on account of its 750 plates — Itinera Alpina, 2 vols. 4to. — Piscium Querelæ, 4to. — Herbarium Diluvianum, fol. — Musæum Diluvianum, 8vo. — Homo Diluvii Testis, 4to. — Historiæ Helveticæ Naturalis Prolegomena — Sciagraphia Lithologica, 4to. — Nova Literaria Helvetica, or Journal of Swiss Literature — a treatise on the Mineral Waters of Switzerland, 4to. His son John Gaspard was an able antiquarian. He translated into English Kœmpfer's History of Japan, 2 vols. fol. and died at London 1729, in the flower of youth. John brother of John James was professor of medicine and physician at Zurich, where he died 1738. He was author of Ægriographia, seu Graminum, Juncorum, &c. Historia, 4to.

SCHIAVONE, Andrea, a Venetian painter, born at Sebenico in Dalmatia 1522. Though poor and uneducated, he rose by the powers of his genius, and his great application to eminence. His designs, however, were not much admired, while his coloring, and the elegance of his draperies were superior to the efforts of his contemporaries. His pictures were esteemed after his decease, though unfortunately for him disregarded by his contemporaries. He died poor, 1582, at Venice.

SCHICKARD, William, professor of Hebrew at Tübingen, died of the plague 1635, at the age of 43. He wrote Horologium, or Hebrew Grammar, 8vo. — treatises de Jure Regio Judæorum, 4to. — Series Regum Persiæ, 4to.

SCHIDONE, Bartholomew, a native of Modena, eminent as a painter. Though patronized by the duke of Parma, his fondness for gaming reduced him to poverty. His pictures are scarce, but possess great merit. He died 1616, aged 56.

SCHILLER, Frederic, a German dramatic writer of celebrity. He was born at Marbach in Wirtemberg, and educated in the military school of Stutgard, where he produced his first dramatic piece, called the Robbers. The principles inculcated in this piece gave such offence to his superiors, that he fled from their resentment to Mannheim, and for some time supported himself in the capacity of a regimental surgeon. An appointment in the theatre at Mannheim proved more congenial to his feelings, and enabled him to produce his Conspiracy of Fiesco, his Intrigue and Love, his Rhenish Thalia, and other pieces. Eager after distinction he went from Mannheim to Mentz, and afterwards to Dresden, and then to Leipzig, where he completed his tragedy of Don Carlos. For some time he resided at Jena as professor of history, and then removed to Weimar, where he died 1805. He wrote besides, the History of the Revolt of the Netherlands from the Spanish Government — the Maid of Orleans, and other dramatic pieces, much admired for originality, fire, and elegance, though occasionally immoral, and deficient in unity.

SCHILLING, Drebold, a native of Soleure, who wrote in German an History of the Wars of the Swifs against Charles duke of Burgundy, published, Berne, fol. 1743. The work is very accurate, as he was present at the scenes which he describes. He lived in the 15th century.

SCHLICHTINGIUS, Jonas de Bukowie, a native of Poland, banished on account of his Socinian principles by the diet of Warlaw. He retired to Muscovy and Germany, and then settled at Zullickaw, where he died 1661, aged 65. His works, which are chiefly commentaries on the holy scripture, were published at Amsterdam, 1666, fol.

SCHMIDT, George Frederic, a native of Berlin, eminent as an engraver. He was the pupil of Larnessen at Paris, and for his abilities was admitted into the French academy of painting. His engravings of portraits were particularly admired. He died at Berlin 1775, aged 63.

SCHMIDT, Erasmus, professor of mathematics, and of Greek at Wittemberg, was born at Delitzsch in Misnia 1560. He published an edition of Pindar with learned notes, 1616, 4to. and died at Wittemberg, 1637.

SCHMIDT, Sebastian, a professor of oriental languages at Strasburg, who died there 1697.

SCHMIDT, John Andrew, a Lutheran divine, born at Worms, 1652. He was theological professor at Mariendal, and died there 1726. He wrote Compendium Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 8vo. — de Bibliothecis, 4to. — Lexicon Ecclesiasticum Minus, 8vo. besides Pardies' Geometry, translated into Latin. &c.

SCHOEFFLIN, John Daniel, a learned German Lutheran divine, born Sept. 6, 1694, at Sulzbourg in Baden Dourlach. He studied at Dourlach, Basil, and Strasburg, and was appointed, in 1720, professor of eloquence and history in this last university. His reputation for learning was so great that he received the most honorable invitations from the emperors of Russia, from Sweden, from Frankfort, from Leyden, and other learned bodies, but he preferred the tranquillity and retirement of Strasburg. In 1726 he quitted his professorship, and travelled at the public expence, and as a philosopher, he visited Italy, Paris, London, and other places. He died at Strasburg of a slow fever, August 7, 1771, universally and deservedly lamented. His works are Historia Zaringo-Badenfis Carlruhe, 7 vols 4to. — Alfatia Diplomatica, 2 vols. fol. — Alfatia Illustrata, 2 vols. fol. — Alfaticarum Rerum Scriptores, fol. — Vindiciæ Typographicæ, 4to. — Vindiciæ Celticæ — Memoirs of a Rising Academy, addressed to the elector palatine, &c.

SCHOMBERG, Henry de, of an ancient family of Misnia, established in France, was made governor of la Marche, and served with reputation under Charles IX. and his two successors. He died suddenly in 1599. His son of the same name succeeded in his government of la Marche, and distinguished himself in Piedmont in 1617, under marshal d'Estrées, and against the Huguenots, in 1622, for which he was made marshal of France. He contributed much in 1625, to the defeat of the English in their attack against the isle of Rhé, and two years after he forced the passage of Suza, where he was severely wounded. In 1630 he made himself master of Pignerol, and relieved Casal, and soon after defeated the rebels in Languedoc, at the famous battle of Castelnaudari, where Montmorenci was wounded and taken prisoner. He was in reward for his services made governor of Languedoc, and died the next year of an apoplexy, 17th Nov. aged 49. He was a man of abilities in the cabinet, as well as in the field. He was ambassador for some time in England, and Germany, and he wrote a Relation of the War in Italy, in which he had been engaged, printed 1630, 4to. again 1669, and 1682. His son Charles distinguished himself also in the service of France, and was made governor of Languedoc, and marshal of France. He conquered the Spaniards at Leucate in Roussillon, and took the town of Tortosa by assault. He died at Paris 6th June, 1656, aged 56.

SCHOMBERG, Frederic Armand de, of an illustrious family, but of a different branch from the preceding, was early engaged in the service of Frederic Henry prince of Orange, and afterwards of his son William. He went in 1650, into the service of the French king, and was made governor of Gravelines and Furnes, and in 1661 sent to command the army in Portugal, where he behaved with such bravery and prudence that Spain was obliged to acknowledge the family of Braganza as lawful sovereigns of Portugal. He was in 1675 made marshal of France, though a protestant, and the next year he went to the campaign of the Low Countries, and obliged the enemy to raise the siege of Maestricht and Charleroi. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes 1685, he quitted France and retired to Prussia where the elector of Brandenburg appointed him his prime minister, and commander in chief. He was afterwards in Portugal and in Holland, and he accompanied William of Orange into England when he invaded the kingdom, and for his services he was created an English duke, made knight of the garter, and rewarded with a pension by the parliament. In 1689, he was sent to Ireland as commander in chief, and the following year he attended William at the battle of the Boyne, and bravely crossed the river which was obstinately defended by the enemy. He was, however, wounded by one of the soldiers of James II. and soon after shot dead by mistake by one of the French refugees in his own regiment, 11th July, 1690. in his 82d year. He was buried in St. Patrick's cathedral, where a monument, and an elegant inscription by Dr. Swift mark his grave.

SCHONER, John, a German philosopher, born at Carlostadt 1477. His abilities were so great that he was chosen, when young, to be mathematical professor at Nuremberg. He was, however, too fond of astrology, though in other respects a man of vast intelligence, and erudition. He published some valuable astronomical tables after those of Regiomontanus — a treatise on Dialling — on the Astronomical Equator — Use of the Globes — Organicum Uranicum, &c. He died 1547.

SCHOOKIUS, Martin, a native of Utrecht, successively professor of languages and philosophy at Utrecht, Derventer, Groningen, and Frankfort on the Oder. He was a man of erudition, though extremely satirical. He

He is author of Exercitationes Variæ — de Harengis, feu Halecibus — de Signaturis Fœtus — de Ciconis — de Statu Reipublicæ Fœderati Belgii — de Scepticismo — de Sternutatione — de Imperio Maritimo — de Linguâ Hellenisticâ, &c. He died at Frankfort 1669, aged 55.

SCHOONFIELD, John Henry, a painter of eminence, born at Bibrach in Germany. Some of his pictures are preserved in the churches and public edifices of Augsbourg. He died 1689, aged 70.

SCHOONJANS, Anthony, a native of Antwerp, distinguished as a painter. After studying in Italy he settled at Vienna where he was patronized by the emperor. His altar pieces for several German churches are much admired. He died 1726, aged 61.

SCHOREL, John, a Flemish painter, born at Schorel a village near Alcemaer in Holland. He studied under Albert Durer, and then went with a friar to Jerusalem, where he painted some very interesting pieces. On his return he passed through Venice and Rome, and was made by pope Adrian VI. superintendant of the Belvidere buildings. After that pontiff's death he returned to his country, where he died 1562, much respected. He was also a tolerable musician and poet, and well understood Latin, French, Italian, and German.

SCHOTTUS, Andreas, a learned German, born at Antwerp, 1552. He was educated at Louvain, and Douay, and upon going to Spain, was in consequence of his great abilities made, 1580, Greek professor at Toledo. He entered among the jesuits in 1586, and afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome, and after three years' residence returned to Antwerp, where he spent the rest of his life, and died 23d Jan. 1629. He was author of Hispania Illustrata, 14 vols. fol. — the Lives of Francis Borgia, Ferdinand Nunez, Peter Ciaconius, &c. besides valuable editions of Pomponius Mela, Cor. Nepos, Valerius Flaccus, Aurelius Victor, &c.

SCHOTTUS, Gaspard, a jesuit, born at Wurtsburg, in Franconia, where he died 1666, aged 58. He resided for some time at Palermo in Sicily, and at Rome, where he became intimate with the famous Kircher. He is the learned author of Physica Curiosa, or Mirabilia Naturæ & Artis, 2 vols. 4to. — Magia Naturalis & Artificialis, 4 vols. 4to. — Technica Curiosa, 4to. — Machina Hydraulico-Pneumatica — Pantometrum Kircherianum, seu Instrumentum Geometricum Novum — Itinerarium Staticum Kircher — Encyclopedia, containing a course of mathematics — Mathesis Cæsa-rea, 2 vols. 4to. — Anatomia Physico-Hydrostatica Fontium & Fluminum, 8vo. — Arithmetica Practica Generalis, 8vo. — Schola Stegano-graphica — Organum Mathematicum, 4to.

SCHREVELIUS, Cornelius, a laborious critic of Holland, born at Haerlem, 1615. He published editions of Homer, Hesiod, and other classics, said to be not very correct. The work by which he is best known, is his Greek Lexicon, 8vo now in general use. He died 1667.

SCHULEMBOURG, Matthias John, count of, was born in 1661, and from his earliest years devoted himself to military affairs. He was first in the service of the king of Poland who entrusted him with the command of the Saxon troops in 1704, and with a small force he bravely withstood, in an advantageous situation, five attacks of Charles XII. of Sweden. In 1708, he was placed at the head of 9000 Poles, who were in the service of the Dutch, and the next year he was at the battle of Malplaquet, where prince Eugene saw and admired his valor, and gave him his esteem. In 1711 he went into the service of the Venetians, and ably defended them against the Turks at the siege of Corfu, where his conduct was so intrepid, that a larger pension was bestowed upon him, and a statue raised to his honor. In 1726 he visited his sister, the countess of Kendal in England, and was received with distinction by George I. and he afterwards returned to Venice, where he died, 1743, universally respected.

SCHULTENS, Albert, a German divine, born at Groningen. He was minister of Wassenar, and professor of oriental languages at Franeker, and afterwards at Leyden, where he died 1741, aged 70. His works are a Commentary on Job, 2 vols. 4to. — a Hebrew Grammar — the Life of Saladin, from the Arabic, folio. — Commentary on Proverbs, 4to. — Animadversiones Philologicæ & Criticæ ad Varia Veteris Testamenti. Loca — a treatise of Hebrew Roots, &c.

SCHULZE, John Henry, a physician born at Colbitz in Magdeburg. He was medical professor at Halle, where he died 1745, aged 58. He was also well skilled in Greek, and in Arabic literature, and wrote Historia Medicinæ a Rerum Initio ad Annum Urbis Romæ, 535, Deducta, 4to. — Physiologia Medica, 8vo. — Pathologia Generalis et Specialis — de Materiâ Medicâ Dissertationes Medicæ & Historicæ, &c.

SCHURMAN, Anna Maria, a German lady born at Cologne 1607. She possessed uncommon powers, and not only excelled in music, painting, sculpture, and engraving, but in the knowledge of the learned languages, of Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic, as well as the modern tongues. When six years old she cut on paper all sorts of figures without model, and two years after designed flowers in a very masterly manner. These great accomplishments were adorned further by the most modest and diffident manners; but her powers were too great to be long concealed from the world, and by the means of her friends and correspondents, of Vossius, Spanheim, Rivetus and others, her reputation was spread over Europe; and she was visited by Richelieu, and other persons of the highest rank, and even princesses. Her devotion was said to be equal to her learning, but in 1650, her attachment to Labadie lessened her fame, and after living with that enthusiast at Altona, and attending him in his last moments, she retired to Wiemar, in Friseland, where she died 1678. She wrote Latin poems — a Defence of Female Study — Eukleria in defence of her attachment to Labadie — Opuscula, in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, printed 1652, 4to.

SCHUT, Cornelius, a painter of Antwerp, the disciple of Rubens. Some of his pictures are still admired in the churches of Antwerp. He died 1660, aged 60.

SCHURTZFLEISCH, Conrad Samuel, a native of Corback in Waldeck, professor of history, poetry, and Greek at Wittenberg. He travelled over Germany, France, France, England, and Italy, and was made counsellor and librarian to the duke of Saxe Wiemar. He died 1708, aged 67. His works are Disputationes Historicae Civiles, 3 vols. 4to. — Letters, 3 vols. 8vo. — Continuation of Sleidan till 1678. — Dissertationes & Opuscula. His brother Henry Leonard, wrote Historia Ensisferorum Ordinis Teutonici, 12mo. 1701.

SCHUUR, Theodore Vander, a painter born at the Hague. He was at Paris where he studied under Sebastian Bourdon, and then went to visit the Italian schools. He was happy in his pieces, which he enriched in the back grounds with fine ancient ruins. He died 1705, aged 77.

SCHWARTZ, Bertholet, the inventor of gunpowder, was a monk of the order of Cordeliers, and was born at Friburg in the 13th century. He was an able chemist, and it is said, discovered the fatal secret of the ingredients of gunpowder, when making some chemical experiments on nitre. This discovery was first applied to fire arms at the battle of Cressy 1346, or according to others as early as 1300 by the Venetians, and it consequently changed the whole art of war. Roger Bacon is considered by some to have been acquainted with the fatal secret, which he refused to reveal.

SCHWARTZ, Christopher, a native of Ingolstadt, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Titian, and the successful imitator of Tintoret. He was patronized by the elector of Bavaria, and was called the Raphael of Germany. He died at Munich 1594, aged 44.

SCHWERIN, Christopher, count of, governor of Niefs and Brieg, and field marshal in the Prussian service, was born 26th Oct. 1684, and rose by merit to the highest honors. He gained the battle of Molwitz, in 1741, when the Prussians thought that all was lost, and he continued to distinguish himself in succeeding engagements against the Austrians, till the battle of Prague in 1757, in which he fell, aged 72. His memory was honored with a statue by the king of Prussia in Berlin, and a monument by Joseph II. in 1783, on the very spot where he expired. He had been, in 1712, envoy from the duke of Mecklenburg, to Charles XII. of Sweden at Bender, and he caught some of the martial spirit of that celebrated monarch.

SCHYNDAL, Bernard, a Dutch painter, whose shepherds, ale-houses, fairs, &c. were much admired. He was born at Haerlem, and died 1716, aged 57.

SCIOPIUS, Gaspar, a learned German, born 1576, at Newark, Upper Palatinate, and known for the virulence with which he attacked every man of merit and reputation. He studied at Amberg, Heidelberg, Altdorf, and Ingolstadt, and early distinguished himself by writing, among other things, a commentary on "Priapeia," with obscene quotations, and licentious remarks. In 1599 he turned Roman catholic, and then abused not only the protestants, but also the jesuits, against whom he wrote not less 30 different treatises. Not only Joseph Scaliger felt the acrimony of his satire, but Henry IV. of France, and James I. of England, to whom he wrote a Latin pamphlet, called an "Eye Salve for his Britannic Majesty." The last part of his life he devoted to the explanation of the prophecies of the Holy Scriptures, and particularly of the Apocalypse, and he pretended to have discovered the very key which Peter left on earth. He died 1649. He was a man of extraordinary learning, and had he possessed equal moderation and good sense, his fame would have been deservedly superior to the rest of the world. His memory was such, that it was said that he could, like another Ezra, have restored the scriptures if lost, as he knew them all by heart. His works were more numerous than his years, the best known of which are Verisimilium Libri quatuor, 8vo. — Commentarius de Arte Criticâ, 8vo. — Clasicum Belli Sacri — de Suâ ad Catholicos Migratione — Notationes in Phædrum — Suspectarum Lectionum — Grammatica Philosophica, 8vo, &c.

SCIPIO, Publ. Cornel. an illustrious Roman. He avenged the death of his father and uncle, who had fallen in Spain, by the total defeat of the Carthaginians in that country, and he afterwards passed into Africa, to carry war to the gates of the capital. The battle of Zama, and the defeat of Annibal put an end to the second Punic war, and the victorious Roman obtained the honorable surname of Africanus. The Romans afterwards behaved with jealousy towards him, and he retired from public clamors to his country house, where he died, B. C. 180.

SCIPIO, Luc. Cornel. brother to the preceding, obtained the name of Asiaticus, from his conquests in Asia, in which he was assisted by the valor, and the judgment of the great Africanus.

SCIPIO NASICA, of the same family, as the conqueror of Carthage, was eminent for his virtues, and for his success in Spain.

SCIPIO, Publ. Æmilianus, son of Paulus, was adopted by the Scipios, and obtained the surname of second Africanus, by his final conquest of Carthage, B. C. 147. He afterwards destroyed Numantia, and enlarged the Roman possessions in Spain. He was found dead in his bed, 128, assassinated, it is supposed, by his political enemies.

SCIPIO, Publius, father-in-law of Pompey, retired from the battle of Pharsalia to Africa, where he was soon after defeated at Thapsus, by J. Cæsar.

SCILATER, William, D. D. a native of Somersetshire, educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He died 1647, on his living of Otterden, in Kent. He was author of elegies and epitaphs, under the title of Threnodia Britannica, 4to. — Palæ-Albion, or History of Great Britain to the Reign of the First James, in Latin and English verse, fol. — Psalms, or Songs of Sion — Genethliacon, or Stemma Jacobi Regis ab Adamo, folio. Another divine of that name was also D. D. fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and vicar of Pitminster, Somersetshire, where he died 1626; author of a Commentary on the Epistles to the Thessalonians and Romans, fol. His son was prebendary of Exeter, and minister of Cullumpton, Devon, and author of some sermons.

SCORAS, a sculptor and architect of Paros, 430 B. C.

B. C. His most admired works were the Mausoleum of Artemisia, and a statue of Venus.

SCORZA, Sinibaldo, a painter and engraver of Voltaggio, in the Genoese territory. He particularly excelled in animals, flowers and landscapes, and also in miniatures. He was banished by his enemies, on the false accusation of being leagued with the duke of Savoy, against whom his countrymen were engaged in war. He was afterwards recalled, and died at Genoa, 1631, aged 41. Some of his engravings from Albert Durer possessed great merit.

SCOTT, Reynolds, an English writer, born of an ancient family near Smeeth, in Kent. He was of Hart hall, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and retired to his seat, where he devoted himself to the reading of obscure authors. He published, "a Perfect Platform of a Hop-Garden, &c." in 4to. second edition 1576 — the Discoveries of Witchcraft, &c. 4to. — Discourse upon Devils and Spirits, &c. These works, in a superstitious age, exposed him to much obloquy, and his labors were attacked with great virulence by those who supported the doctrines of astrology, alchymy, legerdemain, and witchcraft, and he was censured not only by Meric Casaubon, Joseph Glanvil, Raynolds, and others, but by James I., in his Demonologia. This worthy man, distinguished for his piety and benevolence, as well as for his learning, died at the seat of his ancestors, and was buried at the church of Smeeth, 1599.

SCOTT, John, D. D. an able divine, born at Chippenham, Wilts, 1638. Though for three years engaged in trade, he prevailed upon his friends to send him to Oxford, where, without taking his degrees in arts, he accumulated the degrees of bachelor, and doctor in divinity, in 1685. He was successively minister of St. Thomas's, Southwark, rector of St. Peter le Poor, London, rector of St. Giles' in the Fields, prebendary of St. Paul, and canon of Windsor, and refused a bishopric, because he would not take the oath of homage. He died 1694, and was buried in St. Giles' church. He was a warm opposer of the catholics, and wrote various things, the best known of which are the Christian Life, a most valuable and popular work, in folio, and 5 vols. 8vo. — sermons — Cases of Conscience resolved, and some pieces against the papists.

SCOTT, Daniel, an eminent writer, son of a merchant. He was educated at Tewksbury, Gloucestershire, and afterwards went to Utrecht, where he took the degree of L. L. D.; but though he studied divinity, he never entered into the church, as he rather inclined to the baptists. He published an Essay towards the Demonstration of the Scripture Trinity, 1725, which passed through three editions — a New Version of St. Matthew's Gospel, with notes, 1741 — Appendix to H. Stephens' Greek Lexicon, 2 vols. fol. 1745, &c. He died 1759.

SCOTT, Thomas, brother of Daniel, was a dissenting minister, first at Hitchin, Herts, and then at Norwich, where he died 1746. He is author of Occasional Sermons, &c. in which he endeavoured to settle the dispute about the godhead of Christ, by John 20, v. 28. His son Joseph Nicol was pastor of a dissenting congregation at Norwich, and then became Arian, and at last took the degree of M. D. in Scotland, and practised as a physician. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons, and assisted in the revision of Bailey's folio Dictionary. His brother Thomas was also a dissenting minister at Lowestoff, afterwards at Ipswich, and then at Hapton, Norfolk, where he died 1775. He is author of single sermons — of lyric poems — of a translation of Job into English verse, with notes, twice edited, &c.

SCOTT, Thomas, B. D. an English divine, for some years preacher to the English company at Utrecht. He was basely assassinated by a foldier, as he was going to his church, in 1626. He is author of Vox Populi — Vox Dei — Vox Regis — the Belgick Pismire Stinging the Slothful Sleeper, 4to. — Symmachia, or True Love's Knot between Great Britain and the United Provinces, 4to. — a Tongue Combat between Two English Soldiers in the Tilt Boat of Gravesend, 4to. — Digitus Dei — the Projector, a sermon before the judges at Norwich — the Highways of God and the King, two sermons, 4to. — News from Parnassus, 4to.

SCOTT, Samuel, an English painter, who died 1772. His sea pieces were much admired, and were regarded as equal to the interesting works of Vanderelde.

SCOTT, Michael, a native of Balwirie, in Fifeshire, born 1240. He conducted himself with such bravery at the battle of Largo, 1260, that Alexander III. of Scotland, knighted him, and afterwards employed him in various political affairs. He was on the king's death, made one of the regents of Scotland, and died 1291. He was much addicted to astrology, and in consequence of his great learning, passed for a magician. Some of his writings are preserved by Dr. McKenzie.

SCOTT, David, a Scotchman, born near Haddington, 1675. He was strongly attached to the Stuart family, and refused to take the oaths to William III., in consequence of which he was exposed to much persecution. He wrote a History of Scotland, folio, an indifferent performance, and died at Haddington, 1742.

SCOTT, John, an English poet, of the persuasion of the quakers. His father was a London tradesman, and retired to Amwell, Hertfordshire, a place which our author has fondly celebrated in his elegant poem of that name. He wrote besides, "Digest of Laws respecting Highways and Turnpikes" — Observations on the Poor — a Tract on Rowley's Poems. His poems, descriptive and moral, appeared together, 1782, in 8vo. and the author died the next year.

SCOU GAL, Henry, M. A. a learned Scotchman, born at Saltoun, East Lothian, 1650, and educated there, and at Aberdeen university, where he took his degree, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy, and also of theology. His exertions as a preacher brought on a consumption, of which he died 1678, aged 28. This respectable and amiable character wrote "Life of God in the Soul of Man," much admired, besides nine sermons.

SCRIBONIUS LARGUS, a Roman physician of eminence, nence, in the age of Augustus and of Tiberius. Some of his works are extant.

SCRIVERIUS, Peter, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a poet and philologer. He died 1653, aged 73, and was author of "Batavia Illustrata," 4to. — Batavia Comitumque Historia, besides editions of Vegetius, of Aquilius' Chronicon Geldricum, &c.

SCROGGS, for William, a native of Deddington, Oxfordshire, educated for the church, but drawn into the army during the civil wars. He afterwards entered at Gray's Inn, and was called to the bar. His abilities recommended him to the court; he was knighted in 1669, made serjeant at law, and in 1678, raised to the high office of chief justice of the king's bench. Three years after he was removed from his place by an impeachment of the commons, because he was supposed to have acted with partiality on the trial of persons concerned in the popish plots which so frequently alarmed the nation in those turbulent times. He died 1683. Some of his speeches have been preserved in the state trials.

SCUDDER, Henry, minister of Collingbourne Ducis, Wilts, and bachelor of divinity at Cambridge, was author of the Christian's Daily Walk, 8vo. a popular work. He was in his principles a strong presbyterian, and died before the restoration.

SCUDERI, George de, a French writer, born at Havre de Grace, 1603. He possessed great facility in writing, and paid his court to Richelieu by publishing some severe censures on the Cid of Corneille. He wrote much, but with such rapidity that, as Boileau says, he could each month bring forth a volume. His works, therefore, are now little known. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris, 1665.

SCUDERI, Madeleine de, sister of the preceding, was born at Havre de Grace, 1607. She was eminent for her wit, her vivacity, and her writings, and was made member of the Ricovrati academy at Padua. She was also honored with the correspondence of several learned persons, and was rewarded for her works by Mazarine, and pensioned by Christina of Sweden, and Lewis XIV. Her house was the general resort of the witty and the learned. She died 1701, aged 94, and two churches disputed the honor of possessing her remains, which was at last settled by the interference of cardinal de Noailles. Her works are very numerous, but she is better known for some elegant verses, according to Voltaire, than for her ponderous romances. She wrote Clelia, 10 vols. 8vo. — Artamenes, or the Grand Cyrus, 10 vols. — Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Bashaw, 4 vols. — Conversations and Discourses, 10 vols. — a Discourse on Glory, &c.

SCULTETUS, Abraham, a native of Grumberg, in Silesia, professor of theology at Heidelberg, and deputy of the university at the synod of Dordt. He left his place by the envy and intrigues of his enemies, and died at Embden, 1626, aged 60. He wrote Medulla Patrum, 4to. and other theological works.

SCYLAX, a geographer of Caria, whose abilities were employed by Darius in visiting, and making observations in India, B. C. 522. The invention of geographical tables is ascribed to him by several authors. His Periplus was edited by Gronovius, 1697.

SEAMAN, Lazarus, D. D. a native of Leicester, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and made master of Peter-house, in consequence of his active and zealous exertions in favor of the parliament during the civil wars. He was afterwards one of the divines of the Westminster assembly, and died 1675. He published several sermons. It is said that his library was the first ever sold by auction in England.

SEBA, Albert, author of a valuable work on Natural History, in 3 vols. fol. with plates and explanations in Latin and French, published Amsterdam, 1734, was born at Etzeel, East Friseland.

SEBASTIAN, posthumous son of the infant John, and of a daughter of Charles V. succeeded his grandfather John III. on the throne of Portugal, 1557. He invaded in 1574, the Moors in Africa, but without honor, and four years after he went to the assistance of Muly-Mohammed, against his uncle Moluc, king of Fez and Morocco. The expedition was unfortunate, and in a battle fought near Tangiers, 29th July, 1578, the greatest part of the Portuguese army was cut to pieces, and Sebastian shared their fate. As his body could not be found, some supposed that he escaped from the general slaughter, and in consequence, two impostors arose to claim the throne, both of them hermits, and after some confusion, these ambitious hypocrites were removed, the one being executed, and the other sent to the galleys.

SEBASTIANO, a painter, born at Venice, 1485, and called del Plombo, from an office in the lead mines, given him by pope Clement VII. He studied under Bellino and Giorgione, and was the friend of Michael Angelo, at Rome. His Lazarus raised from the Dead, is his best piece, scarce eclipsed by the famous transfiguration of Raphael. He invented the preparing of plaster walls for oil painting, and died 1547.

SECKENDORF, Guy Lewis de, a learned German, born at Aurach, in Franconia, 1626. He was much noticed, and patronized by the duke of Saxe-Gotha, and by the duke of Saxe-Zeitz, and afterwards by the elector of Brandenburg, who made him counsellor of state, and chancellor of Halle university. He wrote several books, the best known of which was Commentarius Historicus, & Apologeticus de Lutheranismis, &c. 2 vols. folio, a valuable work, which contains the best account of Luther. He died at Halle, 18th Dec. 1692.

SECKER, Thomas, a pious prelate, born at Sibthorpe near Newark, Notts, 1693. As his father was a dissentor, he was instructed in the principles of those sectaries, first at Chesterfield, and then in Yorkshire, and afterwards in Gloucestershire, and in 1716, he began to study medicine. In 1719, he visited Paris, where he became acquainted by means of his friends Benson, and Butler, with Mr. Talbot, son of the bishop of Durham, who liberally promised him his father's patronage, if we would enter into the orders of the English church. After mature deliberation he accepted the proposal, but to obtain his degrees with greater facility he went to Leyden, where, after a residence of three months he proceeded M. D. On his return to England he entered as gentleman commoner, at Exeter college, Oxford, and soon after was admitted to the degree of B. A. He was regularly ordained by bishop Talbot, and in 1724, obtained the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for a prebend, and the living of Ryton near Newcastle, 1727. In 1732, he became chaplain to the king, and the next year resigned Ryton for St. James's Westminster. In 1735, his abilities recommended him to the bishopric of Bristol, and in 1737, he was translated to Oxford, and on Hutton's death 1758, the duke of Newcastle, unsolicited, procured his elevation to the see of Canterbury. As he grew old he was much afflicted with rheumatic and gouty complaints, and on the last day of July, 1768, he had the misfortune to break his thigh bone, while turning himself on his couch. A delirium followed the fracture, but recovery was impossible, and he expired on the 3d August following, aged 75. It was afterwards discovered that his thigh bone was perfectly carious, and that the pains which long afflicted him arose from the decayed state of that limb. Secker left the best part of his property to charitable uses, and with great munificence upheld the dignity of his see, and of his clergy. In his conduct as a bishop he was vigilant and attentive, eager to reward merit, and at all times severe against vicious or dissipated members of the church. The dissenters hoped much from his elevation, but he behaved with coolness and distrust towards them, and while he forgot the tenets in which he had been educated, he showed that his present opinions were formed upon mature and well weighed conclusions. He was an elegant scholar, an animated preacher, and a sound divine. His sermons are deservedly popular, and in his lectures on the catechism he displays all the perspicuity, eloquence, and argumentation, which can command not only admiration but conviction, in the pure and apostolic doctrines of the church of England. His works have altogether been published in 12 vols. 8vo. 1795. His life was given to the public by Dr. Porteus, his chaplain and executor.

SECONDAT DE MONTESQUIEU, John Baptist, son of the celebrated Montesquieu, was counsellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux, and devoted himself to the study and the pleasures of agriculture. He died at Bourdeaux 17th July, 1796, aged 79. He wrote Memoir on Electricity, 8vo. against Nollet — Observations on the Mineral Waters of the Pyrenees, 12mo. — Considerations on the Marine of France, 8vo. — Natural History of the Oak, folio.

SECOUSSE, Denys Francis, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 8th Jan. 1691. He was one of Rollin's first pupils, and afterwards left the bar for the study of literature. He was admitted into the academy of belles lettres, and became the friend of the learned and of the great. He continued, at the request of the chancellor d'Aguesseau the collection of royal ordonnances, begun by Lauriere, and also discharged the office of censor royal. He gradually became blind in the last period of life, and died at Paris, 15th March, 1754. He was author of a Collection of Royal Ordonnances, from the second to the 9th vol. lately continued by Ville-vaut — Memoirs for the History of Charles the Bad, 2 vols. 4to. — Memoirs of Condé, edited with Lenglet, 6 vols. 4to. — Dissertations in the Memoirs of the academy of inscriptions.

SECUNDUS, John, a modern Latin poet, born at the Hague 1511. He was well skilled in painting and engraving, and studied law under Alciatus, and became secretary to the archbishop of Toledo. His poems are excellent, and display great wit, elegance, invention, and delicacy. They consist of elegies, epistles, epigrams, odes, and miscellanies, but the most famous is his Basia, or Kisses, a beautiful poem, translated into several modern languages. He died at Utrecht 1536.

SECURIS, John, a native of Wiltshire, educated at New college, Oxford. He afterwards studied at Paris, and then settled at Salisbury, where he practised physic with great success, and died about 1570. He wrote "Prognosticons," a sort of almanacs, besides a Compendium how to keep a Moderate Diet — Detection and Querimony of the Daily Enormities and Abuses committed in the Three Branches of Physic.

SEDAINE, Michael John, a French dramatic writer, son of an indigent architect, was born at Paris 14th June, 1719. He left the obscure employment of stone mason for literature, and by frequenting the theatre, he imbibed such partiality for dramatic pieces, that he directed all the powers of an ardent imagination to the composition of a play. He was successful, and in 1754 Mouet, director of the comic opera, soon discovered that by employing the talents of the new dramatist, he could command numerous and applauding audiences. Sedaine was in his private character a mild and amiable man, and his abilities procured him a seat in the academy of inscriptions, and he also became secretary to the academy of architecture. He died in the spring of 1797. His comic operas are numerous and valuable, and some of them, such as Richard Cœur de Lion, and Blue Beard have made their appearance on the English stage.

SEDGWICK, Obadiab, a native of Marlborough, educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He went as chaplain to sir Horatio Vere in his expedition into the Low Countries, and during the civil wars he warmly espoused the republican principles and frequently preached before the parliament. He published some sermons and religious tracts, and died in his native town 1657, aged 57. There was another of that name, William, of a fanatical turn of mind, who was furnished Doom's-day Sedgwick because he foretold the day of judgment.

SEDDLEY, sir Charles, an English poet, born at Aylesford in Kent 1639. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, but left it without a degree, and became afterwards one of the wits of the debauched court of Charles II. Thus devoted to dissipation of every kind he grew poor; but though unprincipled he was highly offended with the intrigue which James II. had with his daughter, who was in consequence ennobled by the title of countess of Dorchester. This elevation gave him the greater concern, and he espoused the more warmly the revolution, observing that he did it from a principle of gratitude, "for since his majesty," said he, "has made my daughter a countess, I wish to do all I can to make his daughter a queen". Sedley's works were published, 2 vols. 8vo. 1719, and consist of plays, translations, songs, epilogues, &c. but though without much fire or genius, they possess the dangerous art of insinuating loose and licentious principles. He died 1703.

SEDULIUS, Cacilius, an ecclesiastic of the fifth century, author of a poem on the Life of Christ, called Paschale Carmen, published by Aldus 1502, 8vo.

SEED, Jeremiah, an able divine, born at Clifton, near Penrith in Cumberland. He was educated at Lowther, and then entered at Queen's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1732. He was for a long time curate of Twickenham, and in 1741, obtained from his college the rectory of Enham, Hants, where he died 1747. This excellent divine, deservedly esteemed for his private exemplary character, published discourses on several important subjects, 2 vols. 8vo. and after his death his "Posthumous Works, consisting of sermons, letters, &c. appeared under the care of Mr. Hall of his college, 2 vols. 8vo.

SEE-MA-KOANG, a Chinese philosopher in the 11th century. Though a Mandarin of distinction, and the favorite of the emperor, he relinquished all his employments about the court, and retired to solitude, where he devoted himself to study and meditation. He was fifteen years in composing an history of China, which began at the year 403 before Christ. He wrote also some moral pieces, &c. and was universally esteemed as a learned and amiable man.

SEGAR, for William, garter king at arms, and author of Honor Civil and Military, fol. 1602, died 1633. His MSS. on heraldry were valuable, and from them Edmonson has chiefly extracted his baronage of England. He was once imposed upon, and granted to George Brandon, the common hangman, the royal arms of Arragon, with a canton of Brabant, for which he was imprisoned, but again set at liberty when the particulars were made known.

SEGHES, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born at Antwerp. He studied under Janfens, and ably imitated Rubens and Vandyck. He was happy in pieces of devotion, but he also excelled in representations of musicians and low scenes. He died at Antwerp 1641, aged 49. His brother Daniel who was a jesuit, painted flowers and insects with admirable art. He was the disciple of Velvet Breughel. His pieces sold for a high price. He died at Antwerp 1660, aged 70.

SEGNERI, Paul, a native of Nettuno, who entered among the jesuits, and became by the austerity of his manners, and the eloquence of his tongue, a popular preacher, and an active missionary of the society. He was invited to Rome by pope Innocent XII. to whom he became chaplain; but he soon after fell into a languid state, which carried him off 9th Dec. 1694, aged 70. He wrote sermons, 7 vols. — the Unbeliever without Excuse — the Pastor instructed — the Illusions of the Quietists — the Servant of Mary, &c. all collected into 3 vols. fol.

SEGRAIS, John Renaud de, a French poet, born 1624, at Caen, of a noble family. He was educated among the jesuits, but declined to enter into orders, and afterwards distinguished himself so much by his pen, that he was introduced by count de Frisque, to Mad. de Montpensier, who took him into her family. His opposition to her marrying count de Lauzun, drove him from her protection, but he found a new patroness in Mad. de la Fayette, in whose house and society he was for seven years treated with kindness and honorable distinction. He afterwards returned to his native country and married a rich heiress 1679, and spent the rest of his life in the retirement of learned ease and independence. He died at Caen of a dropfy 1701. His conversation was very fascinating and witty, and many of his anecdotes are recorded in the "Segrasiana," published after his death. He was a member of the French academy, and wrote several things, the best known of which are his poems, consisting of pastorals, besides translations of Virgil's Georgics and Æneid. His prose writings were chiefly romances possessing little merit.

SEGUI, Joseph, a native of Rodez, who early devoted himself to belles lettres and poetry, and obtained in 1732, the poetical prize of the French academy. He was honored in consequence of his success with a place at the French academy, the abbey of Genlis, and a canonry in Meaux cathedral. He died at Meaux March, 1761, aged 72. He published Panegyrics, 2 vols. 12mo. — sermons, 2 vols. — Academical Discourses. His panegyric of St. Lewis was received with such applause, that some attributed it to the superior powers of la Mothe.

SEGUIER, John Francis, a native of Nismes, who abandoned jurisprudence to follow his more favorite studies of botany. He improved his knowledge by travelling with the marquis Scipio Maffei into France, England, Holland, Germany, and Italy, and was honored on his return with the place of president of the academy of Nismes. This indefatigable writer, who also paid great attention to medallic history, died at Nismes, 1st Sep. 1784, aged 81. He wrote Bibliotheca Botanica, 4to. — Plantæ Veronenses, 8vo. — a Translation of Maffei's Memoirs, 2 vols. 12mo.

SEJANUS, Ælius, a well known favorite of Tiberius. He first introduced himself to the notice of Caius Cæsar the grandson of Augustus, and afterwards engrossed the favors of Tiberius when on the throne. Not satisfied with the honors which he enjoyed he aspired to the imperial purple, and after murdering Drusus the emperor's son he claimed the hand of his widow, but was indignantly rejected. Tiberius at last opened his eyes, and the favorite deserted by all his flatterers was strangled A. D. 31, and his body thrown into the Tiber.

SELDEN, John, a learned Englishman, born at Salvington, Suffex, 1584. He was educated at Chichester school, and Hart hall, Oxford, after which he entered at Clifford's Inn, and two years after removed to the Inner Temple. He early distinguished himself as an antiquarian, and in 1610, published Jani Anglorum Facies Altera, & Duello, or the Origin of Single Combat. Besides other pieces he published Titles of Honor, 1614, a work of great merit, and in 1618, appeared his History of Tithes, which as it censured the ignorance and laziness of the clergy gave great offence to that body. The work was attacked by by several writers, especially Montague afterwards bishop of Norwich, and the author at last was obliged to make submission before the lords of the privy council for this offensive publication. His opinions in favor of the privileges of the house of commons, and his opposition to the measures of the court, drew upon him in 1621, the displeasure of king James, who committed him to the custody of the sheriff of London, from which he was liberated by the interference of his friend bishop Andrews. In 1623, he was chosen member of parliament for Lancaster, and two years after for Great Bedwin, and in the house he distinguished himself by his attack on the character of Buckingham, and became one of the managers of his impeachment. His opposition to the measures of the court continued, and for the freedom of his sentiments he was, in 1629, arrested with several other members, and upon refusing to make submission to the court he was sent to the king's bench prison. He was again sent into confinement the following year; but his sufferings in the cause of public liberty were rewarded by the parliament of 1646, who voted him 5000*l.* for his losses. Though apparently much engaged in politics, Selden was laboriously employed in literary pursuits. In 1634, he defended, in his Mare Clausum, the privileges of the English, and their rights in the herring fishery, against Grotius's work, called Mare Liberum. He was in 1640, elected member for Oxford university, and in 1642, it was intended by the king's ministers to remove lord Lyttelton from the seals, and to give them to him, as though he opposed the measures of the court, he was a sincere friend to the just prerogatives of the crown, but the offer was not made, as his delicate constitution, and his great love of ease prevented his exertions, and would have induced him to decline the honorable office. In 1643, he became one of the lay members of the Westminster assembly of divines, and he about this time took the covenant, and was made by the parliament keeper of the records of the Tower. But, however, though he continued member of the house, and was in 1644, one of the 12 commissioners of the admiralty, he did not concur in the violent measures of the parliament, and when the Icon Basilice appeared, Cromwell in vain solicited him to employ his talents to write against it. He died 30th Nov. 1654, at White friars, at the house of the countess of Kent, with whom he lived in habits of friendship, and some report, of criminal intimacy. He was buried in the Temple church, and Usher preached a sermon in honor of his memory. His valuable library was given by his executors to the university of Oxford. As a scholar Selden ranks very high. He was, not only skilled in the Hebrew and oriental languages, but he was acquainted with all laws, divine and human, and in the stores of a most retentive memory he had treasured up whatever is valuable, interesting, and important, in ancient and modern literature. He was, as Grotius states him, the glory of the English nation, and as Whitelock says, his mind was as great as his learning, and he was as hospitable and as generous as any man. He was a person, as Clarendon has observed, whom no character can flatter, or transmit in any expressions equal to his merit and virtue. His learning was stupendous, and if he had some infirmities they were weighed down with wonderful and prodigious abilities, and excellences, in the other scale. The works of this great character were collected by Dr. Wilkins, 3 vols. fol. generally bound in six, 1726, of which the two first contain his Latin pieces, and the third his English, with a long life prefixed.

SELEUCUS NICANOR, a king of Syria at the division of the provinces after Alexander's death. He was at last assassinated after a stormy reign, by Plotemy Ceraunus, B. C. 280.

SELIM I. second son of Bajazet II. defeated his father in 1512, and after poisoning him, and cutting off his elder brother Achmet, and the younger Kordud he ascended the throne of Turkey. Firm in his power he marched against Egypt, and in a bloody battle near Aleppo, he killed Campson Gaury the Egyptian monarch, and in another battle near Cairo defeated the new king, and totally crushed the power of the Mamelukes, which for 260 years had governed the country. He was equally successful against the Persians; but whilst he prepared to make war against the christians, he was attacked by a violent disease, which soon proved fatal. He died at Cluri in Thrace, 21st Sep. 1520, on the very spot where he had caused his father to be poisoned.

SELIM II. grandson of the preceding, ascended the throne after the death of his father Solymen II. 1566. He violated in 1570, the treaty which existed between him and the Venetians, and by a sudden attack he made himself master of Cyprus, but the next year he lost at the battle of Lepanto above 35,000 men besides his fleet, and therefore readily listened to terms of peace. Devoting his time to the sensual pleasures of his seraglio, he died little respected, 1574, aged 52.

SELIS, Nicholas Joseph, a French poet, born at Paris 27th April, 1737. By the friendship of Delille he left Amiens, where his poetical talents were already admired, and settled at Paris, respected by the learned, and admitted professor of belles lettres at the central school of the Pantheon, and member of the national institute. He is author of a translation of Persius, with notes, 8vo. — Epistles in verse — Relation of Voltaire's Disorder, Confession and Death — Letter to de la Harpe on the College of France — Discourse on Central Schools — Dissertations Literary and Grammatical, &c. He died 19th Feb. 1802.

SELKIRK, Alexander, a native of Largo in Scotland, who, by his application, and his knowledge of navigation, obtained the command of a ship, and made several voyages to the South seas. In one of these, 1705, while in the ship of captain Pradling, he had a quarrel with him, and in consequence of it was cruelly sent on shore, on the desert island of Juan de Fernandez, with only a fowling piece, gunpowder and shot, and very few necessaries. In this desolate situation he continued three years, comfortably subsisting on the goats, with which the island abounded, and the various sorts of fish, which he caught around the shore, till the accidental arrival of captain Wood Rogers, in 1709, removed him from his solitary abode. This singular adventure forms the basis of Robinson Crusoe, a romance embellished by the pen of the celebrated de Foe.

SELLER, Abednego, a native of Plymouth, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. He became minister of Combeintine head, Devonshire, and obtained another living in London, both of which he lost at the revolution for refusing to take the oaths to William. He wrote remarks relating to the state of the church, in the three first centuries, 8vo. — the Devout Communicant, often reprinted under the title of the Week's Preparation for the Sacrament, 12mo. — Tracts against Popery. He died about 1720, aged 73.

SELLIUS, Godfrey, a native of Dantzic, member of the imperial academy, and of the Royal society in London. He lived much of his time in France, and died at Charenton, where he had been confined a little time in consequence of insanity, 25th June 1767. He wrote Geographical Description of Dutch Brabant, 12mo. — Voyage to Hudson's Bay, 8vo. — Dictionary of Monogrammes — a Natural History of Ireland — History of the Ancient Revolutions of the Globe — History of the United Provinces, 8 vols. 4to.

SEMIRAMIS, wife of Ninus, and queen of Assyria, is celebrated in mythological history, as a warrior, and as the builder of Babylon. She is said to have resigned the throne to her son Ninyas, about 2108 B. C.

SENAAC, John, a native of Lombes, who became physician to the French king, counsellor of state, and superintendant of the mineral waters of the kingdom. He died at Paris, 20th Dec. 1770. He published a translation of Heister's Anatomy, with Physical Essays on the Use of the Parts of the Human Body, 8vo. and 3 vols. 12mo. — treatise on the Causes and the Cure of the Plague, 4to. — on the Structure of the Heart, 2 vols. 4to. — de Reconditâ Febrium Naturâ & Curatione, 8vo. — Reflections on Drowned Persons — Memoir on the Diaphragm, &c.

SENAUDT, John Francis, a native of Antwerp, who became member of the oratory, and afterwards its superior. He died at Paris, universally respected, 3d Aug. 1672, aged 71. He wrote a treatise on the Use of the Passions, 4to. and 12mo. a popular work, translated into English, German, Italian, &c. — a Paraphrase of Job, 8vo. — the Christian Man, 4to. — and the Criminal Man, 4to. — the Duties of the Sovereign, 12mo. — Lives of Saints and Illustrious Persons — sermons.

SENECA, Lucius Annaeus, a native of Corduba, celebrated as an orator and as a pleader in the Roman Forum.

SENECA, Luc. Annaeus, son of the preceding, was also born at Corduba. He was appointed tutor to Nero by Agrippina; but all the sound precepts which he had inculcated were forgotten when his pupil ascended the throne, and instead of being rewarded, the virtuous preceptor was marked for destruction. On the discovery of Piso's conspiracy, he was commanded to destroy himself, and after taking poison, and then opening his veins to no effect, he was suffocated in a warm stove, A. D. 65. As a philosopher and moralist, Seneca ranks very high. The tragedies ascribed to him are possessed of little merit.

SENECAI, or SENECE, Anthony Bauderon de, a French poet, born at Macon, 13th Oct. 1643. He left the profession of the law for belles lettres; but an unfortunate duel drove him to Savoy. Here a quarrel with the brothers of a lady who had shown strong partiality for him, rendered his residence disagreeable, and he retired to Madrid, from whence he was permitted to return to France. He became first valet to Maria Theresa, the wife of Lewis XIV. and after her death, entered into the service of the dukes of Angoulême. He died at Macon, 1st Feb. 1737. He wrote epigrams — satires — poetical novels — and fugitive poems, in a pleasing style.

SENNACHERIB, a Syrian king, whose army, when besieging Jerusalem in the reign of Hezekiah, was struck by a pestilence, and nearly destroyed. He escaped with difficulty from the ravages of the disease, and was at last slain in the temple of his gods by his two sons, B. C. 710.

SENNERTUS, Daniel, a German physician, born at Breslaw, son of a shoe-maker. He studied at Wittenberg, and afterwards at Leipzig, Jena, Frankfort, and Berlin, and on his return was elected professor of physic at Wittenberg. He introduced the study of chemistry among his pupils, and acquired great celebrity both as a professor and as a practitioner; but his censure of the ancients, and his opinions about the soul, drew upon him the virulence of contemporary writers, and the charge of impiety. He was three times married, and had by his first wife seven children, and none by the rest. He died of the plague at Wittenberg, 21st July, 1637. He wrote various things, printed together at Venice, 3 vols. folio, 1640, and Lyons, 1676, 6 vols. folio.

SENNERTUS, Andrew, son of the preceding, was born 1535, at Wittenberg, and became there professor of oriental literature. He lived to a good old age, highly respected, and died 1619, aged 84. He wrote treatises on the Hebrew language, and other books.

SEPULVEDA, John Genes de, a Spanish writer, born at Cordova, 1491. He was historiographer to Charles V. and is known for his profligate vindication of the cruelties of the Spaniards against the Indians, against the humane representations of de la Casas. He wrote some other works, not much esteemed, and died at Salamanca, 1572.

SERAPION, John, an Arabian physician, whose works appeared at Venice, 1497, folio. He flourished 890. There was a medical writer of that name, born in Alexandria, in the fifth century.

SERARIUS, Nicholas, a learned jesuit, born at Rambervillers in Lorraine. He taught philosophy at Wurtzburg and Mayence, and died at the last place, May 20th, 1610, aged 65. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, folio — Prolegomena, folio — Opuscula Theologica, &c. all of which have been collected into 16 vols. folio, and display great labor and extensive erudition.

SERENUS SANMONICUS, the preceptor of young Gordian, was a physician of the third century. He wrote wrote a poem on Medicine and was put to death by Caracalla. — Another of that name was a mathematician, author of a treatise on Conic Sections.

SERGARDI, Lewis, a native of Sienna, author of some elegant Latin poems, and satires. He was an ecclesiastic, and died 1726, aged 86. His satirical reflections on Gravina are deservedly censured.

SERGIUS, a native of Syria, patriarch of Constantinople, and head of the Monothelites, a sect which supported that there was only one will and one operation in Christ, a doctrine condemned by a council of Constantinople. He died 638.

SERLIO, Sebastian, an architect, born at Bologna. He was employed by Francis I. in embellishing the palaces of Fontainebleau, &c. He died in France, 1552, and was known for a treatise on Architecture, printed, Venice, 1584, 4to.

SERRANUS, or DE SERRES, John, a learned Frenchman, who, as a protestant, escaped with difficulty the St. Bartholomew massacre, and fled to Laufanne. He was afterwards minister at Nîmes, and enjoyed the favor of Henry IV. He published in 1597 a book, called "de Fide Catholica," in which he attempted to reconcile the protestants and Roman catholics to the same tenets, in consequence of which he displeased both parties, and was at last supposed to have been poisoned by the Calvinists of Geneva, as he died there suddenly, 1598, aged about 50. He wrote also a treatise on the Immortality of the Soul, 8vo. — Inventory of the History of France, 2 vols. folio. — Memoirs of the third Civil War of France, 3 vols. 8vo. — History of Five kings of France — de Statu Religionis & Reipub. in Francia — besides an edition of Plato, 3 vols. folio, of which the Latin version is very elegant, but inferior in accuracy to that of Ficinus.

SERRES, Oliver de, a French agriculturist, born at Villeneuve de Berg, near Viviers, 1539. Though his chief delight was in the country, he was prevailed upon by Henry IV. to come to Paris, and as the monarch was pleased with his conversation, he made him superintendant of his plantations. He was the first who introduced the white mulberry-tree into France, and to his labors agriculture was much indebted for the rapid improvement which it made under his directing hand. He died 1619, aged 80. He wrote a treatise on the White Mulberry-tree, and on Silk, since reprinted — the Theatre of Agriculture and the Management of Land, 4to. a work of great merit and utility, and often reprinted.

SERTORIUS, Quintus, a famous Roman, who, after distinguishing himself in war under Marius and Cinna, found himself proscribed by Sylla, and retired to Spain, where he declared himself independent. He was at last defeated by Pompey and Metellus, and assassinated by one of his officers, B. C. 73, after governing the country with great wisdom and moderation, and every where showing himself valiant, vigilant, and active.

SERVANDONI, John Nicolas, a Florentine architect and painter, born 1695. He possessed great abilities for the display of theatrical shows, and therefore was engaged at Paris at the play-houses from 1728 to 1746. He was in London 1749, and prepared that beautiful edifice for the exhibition of fire works on Tower-hill, in honor of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. He died 1766. The best known of his paintings are the Descent of Æneas into Hell — the Triumph of Conjugal Love — Hero and Leander; and of his architectural powers, the portal of St. Sulpice at Paris, is a beautiful specimen.

SERVETUS, Michael, a native of Villanuova in Aragon, son of a notary. He studied the law at Toulouse, but afterwards applied to medicine at Paris, and took there his doctor's degree. The boldness and pertinacity of his opinions created him enemies, and he left the capital to settle at Lyons, but afterwards he retired to Charlieu. On the invitation of the archbishop of Vienne in Dauphiny, he was prevailed upon to fix his residence there, and he might have lived in peace and respected, had he been satisfied to seek celebrity in medical pursuits alone. Eager to publish his Arian opinions on religion, he sent three questions to Calvin, on the Divinity of Christ, on Regeneration, and on the Necessity of Baptism, and when answered with civility, he reflected on the sentiments of his correspondent with arrogant harshness. This produced a quarrel, and ended in the most implacable hatred, so that Calvin, bent on revenge, obtained, by secret means, copies of a work in which his antagonist was engaged, and caused him to be accused before the archbishop as a dangerous man. Servetus escaped from prison; but on his way to Italy, he had the imprudence to pass in disguise through Geneva, where he was recognized by Calvin, and immediately seized by the magistrates as an impious heretic. Forty heretical errors were proved against him by his accusers, but Servetus refused to renounce them, and the magistrates, at last yielding to the loud representations of the ministers of Basil, Berne, and Zurich, and especially of Calvin, who demanded the punishment of a profane heretic, ordered the unhappy man to be burnt. On the 27th Oct. 1553, the wretched Servetus was conducted to the stake, and as the wind prevented the flames from fully reaching his body, two long hours elapsed before he was freed from his miseries. This cruel treatment deservedly called down the general odium on the head of Calvin, who ably defended his conduct and that of the magistrates. Servetus published various works against the Trinity, which were burnt in disgrace at Geneva, and other places. They bore for title, de Trinitatis Erroribus Libri Septem — Dialogorum de Trinitate Libri Duo — de Justitiâ Regni Christi, &c. — Christianismi Restitutio — Apologia pro Serveto, &c. As he said in his Christianismi Restitutio, that the whole mass of blood passes through the lungs by means of the pulmonary veins and arteries, some have attributed the discovery of the circulation of the blood to him, which, however, must be, with more satisfactory reasons, claimed by Harvey. The History of the Opinions and of the Misfortunes of Servetus has been published by Mosheim, 1728, in 4to, and is an interesting performance. Servetus wrote besides, some medical tracts, tracts — and a translation of Ptolemy's Geography.

SERVIUS, Honoratus Maurus, a Latin grammarian, author of a valuable Commentary on Virgil in the fourth century.

SERVIUS TULLIUS, sixth king of Rome, distinguished himself by the regulations which he introduced among his subjects with respect to rank, law, and property. He was murdered by his son-in-law the second Tarquin, 534 B. C.

SESOSTRIS, a fabulous king of Egypt, who is said to have extended his conquests over various parts of the world. It is supposed that he at last destroyed himself when borne down by age and infirmities.

SESSA, an Indian philosopher, who is said to be the inventor of the game of chess. When he presented his invention to Scheram, king of India, the monarch, pleased with his ingenuity, desired him to demand for his reward whatever he pleased. Sessa asked only a grain of wheat to cover the first square of the chess board, two for the second, four for the third, and so on in progressive order through the 64 squares. The king regarded the request as unworthy of his merit; but the philosopher persisted in his wishes, and when the numeration began to be made, it soon appeared how difficult it would be to grant it, since all the granaries of the kingdom contained not wheat enough to satisfy the demand. The king, still more pleased with the wisdom of the philosopher, conferred on him the highest honors of his kingdom.

SESTO, Cesare de, a painter of Milan, the best of the pupils of Leonard de Vinci. His pieces are deservedly admired for elegance, correctness, and taste. He died at the beginning of the 16th century.

SETTLE, Elkanah, an English poet. He was born at Dunstable, Bedfordshire, 1648, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, which he left without a degree to reside in London. He there soon distinguished himself by his writings, became the city poet with a pension, and composed some dramatic pieces of merit, besides the Medal Reversed — Azariah and Hushai, against Dryden, in which he showed himself a very formidable rival, "and left the palm of superiority," says Johnson, "undecided." His Cambyfes, king of Persia — Fatal Love — Empress of Morocco, &c. are mentioned with applause. He was known also as a violent supporter of the measures of administration, in whose favor he was a weekly journalist. He died in the Charter-house, 1724, comptroller of the play-house.

SEVERUS, Lucius Septimius, a Roman, emperor after Pertinax. He took as his partner on the throne, Albinus, whom, after the defeat and death of his other rival, Pescennius Niger, he cut off in Gaul. He was a brave general, and made many conquests in the East, and built the Roman wall in Britain, to check the invasions of the Picts. He died at York, A. D. 211. Two other emperors of that name afterwards perished by the hand of their enemies, one by Maximin 307, the other 461.

SEVERUS, Cassius, a Roman orator, banished into Crete by Augustus, on account of the severity of his satirical declamations.

SEVERUS, Sulpitius, an historian, called the Christian Sallust. His Historia Sacra, is an elegant work, from the creation to the year of Christ 400, edited Padua, 1741, 2 vols. 4to. He died 420.

SEVERUS, L. Cornel. a Latin poet in the age of Augustus.

SEVERUS, a heretic of the second century. He maintained with Tatian two opposite principles, one good, and the other evil, &c.

SEVIGNE', Mary de Rabutin, marquise de, a lady, eminent for her wit, and for her virtues, daughter of Cellus Benignus de Rabutin, baron of Chantal, was born 1626. She, when little more than a year old, lost her father at the defence of Rhé against the English, and in 1644 she married the marquis of Sevigné, who seven years after fell in a duel. Thus left a widow with a son and daughter, she devoted herself to the education of these children, and had the happiness to find her labors most successfully rewarded. Her daughter married, in 1669, the count de Grignan, governor of Provence, and it was at her house that she caught a fever, and died 1696. She was a woman of great mental powers, and her letters are considered as the best models for epistolary writings. They have frequently been published; and the best edition is in 8 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1754. In the celebrated dispute about the merit of the ancients and the moderns, she said that the ancients are the finest, and we are the prettiest. A collection of anecdotes, moral sentiments, and apophthegms, extracted from her letters, and called Sevigniana, appeared at Paris, 1756. Her son was one of the admirers of Ninon de l'Enclos, and disputed with Madame Dacier about a passage in Horace. He died 1713.

SEVIN, Francis, member of the academy of belles lettres, and keeper of the MSS. in the king's library, was born in the diocese of Sens, and died 1741. He went in 1728 with Fourmont to Constantinople, in search of MSS. and returned with 600, among which, however, were none of the ancient Greek authors. His letters in this voyage have appeared in 8vo. and they contain interesting accounts about the Levant, Egypt, &c. He wrote a Dissertation on Menes or Mercury, the first king of Egypt, 12mo. — and communications to the memoirs of the academy.

SEWARD, Thomas, an English divine, who obtained Eyam rectory in Derbyshire, and a prebend of Lichfield cathedral. He wrote some poems, which are preserved in Dodsley's collection, and he also published an edition of the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, and a treatise on the conformity between the pagans and the Romish church. He died at Lichfield 1790, aged 82. He was father to Anne Seward, whose poetical and literary abilities are so well known.

SEWARD, William, a native of London, son of a brewer. He was educated at the Charter-house, and at Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. As he possessed a comfortable fortune, he devoted himself to literary ease, unambitious of honors, or of any distinction, except what private merit and virtue confer. He was fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and was highly and deservedly respected for urbanity of manners, and entertaining anecdotes by those who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He published Anecdotes of distinguished Persons, extracted from scarce curious books, 5 vols. 8vo. to which he afterwards added a supplement, in 2 vols. under the title of Biographiana. This worthy man died 1799, aged 52.

SEWELL, William, a quaker, born at Amsterdam, of English parents, 1654. He practised as a surgeon at Amsterdam, but distinguished himself chiefly by his excellent History of Quakers, written in low Dutch, 1717, and translated into English in folio. He wrote besides, a Dictionary of the English and Low Dutch Languages, 4to. — a Dutch Grammar — a translation of Josephus — of Kennet's Roman Antiquities. He died at Amsterdam, 1720.

SEWELL, George, an English poet and physician, born at Windsor, and educated at Eton, where his father was treasurer and chapter clerk to the college, and at Peter-house, Cambridge. He afterwards studied medicine at Leyden, and then settled at Hampstead, where for some time he met with great success, but died poor, 8th Feb. 1726, and was meanly buried, unattended by friends or relations, though universally and deservedly esteemed. He wrote seven controversial pamphlets — the Life of John Philips — a Vindication of the English Stage — for Walter Raleigh, a tragedy, acted at Lincoln's inn fields, 1719 — Richard the first, left unfinished — two Moral Essays, besides single poems, &c.

SEXTUS EMPYRICUS, a Pyrrhonian philosopher, preceptor to the emperor Antoninus. As he was one of those philosophers who guided their practice by experience, his followers have received from him the name of Empyrics. Two of his compositions are extant.

SEXTUS, a native of Cheronea, nephew of Plutarch. He was a stoic philosopher, and was preceptor to L. Verus, and to Marcus Aurelius.

SEYDLITZ, Frederic William, baron de, one of the famous generals of the great Frederic, born in the duchy of Cleves. He distinguished himself in the war of Silesia, and ably covered the retreat of the Prussian army after the fatal day of Kolin. He was at the battle of Rossbach, and defeated the Russians at Zorndorf. He died 1773, covered with glory, and his memory was honored by the gratitude of Frederic, who raised him a public statue at Berlin.

SEYMOUR, Edward, protector of the kingdom, and guardian to Edward VI. to whom he, as brother of Jane Seymour, was uncle, was created viscount Beauchamp, and duke of Somerset. Though he discharged his trust of protector with ability, and supported the reformation, he was violently opposed by the party of the earl of Warwick, and at last brought to the scaffold as guilty of high treason, a disgraceful sentence, which the young king was prevailed upon to confirm, 1552. His brother Thomas, admiral of England, had, by his unnatural influence, suffered on the scaffold three years before on a charge of high treason.

SEYMOUR, Anne, Margaret, and Jane, daughters of Edward, duke of Somerset, were known for their poetical talents. Their 104 Latin distichs on the death of Margaret de Valois, queen of France, were translated into French, Greek, and Italian, printed at Paris, 1551, 8vo. but possess little merit. The eldest, Anne, became wife of the earl of Warwick, and afterwards of sir Edward Hunton. Margaret died single, and also Jane, who was maid of honor to queen Elizabeth.

SEYMOUR, lady Arabella, daughter of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox, the youngest brother of Darnley, the husband of Mary of Scots. Her mother was a daughter of sir William Cavendish, of Chatsworth, Derbyshire. Her affinity to the royal family proved the source of her misfortunes; and in those turbulent times, the measures planned by the disaffected for her elevation to the English throne, procured her severe imprisonment under Elizabeth. Soon after James's accession, she privately married William Seymour, the second son of lord Hertford; but as this was without the permission of the king, she was seized, and with her husband conveyed to the Tower. They escaped after a year's confinement; but though the husband made good his flight on board a vessel, lady Arabella was taken, and four years after, 1615, died in her melancholy prison.

SFONDRATE, Francis, senator of Milan, and state counsellor to Charles V. was born at Cremona, 1494. He was employed by the emperor as ambassador to Sienna, but after his wife's death he took orders, and was raised by Paul III. to the bishopric of Cremona, and to the dignity of cardinal. He died 31st July 1550, aged 56. He wrote the Rape of Helen, a poem — He left two sons, Paul, and Nicolas who obtained the tiara under the name of Gregory XIV. — One of his grandsons, Paul Æmilius, became a cardinal, and died at Rome, 14th Feb. 1618, aged 57. — Another, Celestin, became also a cardinal, and abbot of St. Gal. He died at Rome, 4th Sep. 1696, aged 53, author of Gallia Vindicata — Nodus Prædestinationis Dissolutus, 4to. &c.

SFORZA, James, a renowned warrior, surnamed the Great, born at Cotignola, 1639. He was the son of a laborer or shoe-maker, and attracted by the fame of a military life, he joined a party of soldiers passing through his village, and gradually rose by valor to command. He was for some time in the service of Joan, queen of Navarre, and was afterwards made gonfalonier of Rome by pope John XXIII. and also count of Cotignola. His abilities were now displayed in the defence of Naples, when besieged by Alphonso, king of Arragon, whom he obliged to raise the siege. In his pursuit of the flying enemy, he was unfortunately drowned in the river Pescara, 1424, after rendering his name illustrious, and laying the foundation of the noble house of the Sforzas, dukes of Milan.

SFORZA, Francis, natural son of the preceding, became an eminent statesman and a great general. He served under his father, and was present at his melancholy choly death, and continued the war against Alphonso with equal success. He afterwards served Joan of Naples, and also her successor René, duke of Anjou, and his reputation in arms was such that he was chosen by the pope, the Venetians, and Florentines, general of their armies against the duke of Milan, though he had married his daughter. The death of the duke changed the face of affairs, 1447, Sforza was appointed general of the Milanese against Venice, and after a successful campaign, he turned his arms against his employers, and obliged them to name him duke of Milan, an honor which he deserved for his services, and which was acknowledged by the French king, and to which afterwards was added the sovereignty of Genoa. This celebrated warrior died 1466.

SFORZA, Galeas-Marie, succeeded his father Francis, as duke of Milan; but his debaucheries, and his ferocious conduct, revolted the affection of the people, and he was assassinated 10 years after, 25th Dec. 1476. His son John Galeas Marie, was for a little time under the guardianship of his mother, but the government was seized by his uncle Ludovic-Marie, a monster of iniquity, who administered slow poison to him, and cut him off in 1494. The murderer was seized by Louis de Tremouille, the general of Lewis XII. and carried to France, where he died in prison, 1510.

SFORZA, Catherine, natural daughter of Galeas-Marie, mentioned above, acquired celebrity for her courage and presence of mind. She married Jerome Riario, prince of Forli, who was some time after assassinated by Francis Ursus, who had revolted against the government of her husband. She in consequence fell with her children into the hands of the enemy; but found means to escape to Rimini, which still continued attached to her person, and she defended it with such determined bravery against her enemies, who threatened to put to death her children if she did not surrender, that at last she restored herself to sovereign power. She afterwards married John de Medicis, and again in 1500, ably defended Forli against the attacks of the duke of Valentino, the illegitimate son of Alexander VI. When obliged to surrender, she was taken prisoner, and confined in the castle of St. Angelo, but soon after set at liberty, though never restored to her dominions. This heroic woman died soon after.

SFORZA, Isabella, of the same family as the preceding, was distinguished for her learning in the 16th century. Her letters possessing great merit, were published at Venice by Hortensio Lando, 1549.

SHADWELL, Thomas, an English poet, descended of a good family, and born at Stanton hall, Norfolk, 1640. He was of Caius college, Cambridge, and afterwards of the Middle Temple, but after travelling abroad, he turned all his attention to dramatic composition, and acquired great celebrity. His plays were 17 in number, besides other poems, &c. At the revolution he was made historiographer to the king, and poet laureat in the room of Dryden, who resented the appointment by the severest satire in his Mack Flecknoe. In spite, however, of the attacks of malevolence, he possessed merit, and wrote with great ease, and rapidity, so that he composed his "Psyche" in five weeks.

He was an amiable man and died 6th Dec. 1692, it is said, in consequence of a large dose of opium, taken by mistake. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Brady, and a monument erected to his honor in Westminster abbey, by his son sir John. The best known of his plays were his Virtuoso — the Gentleman of Alface — Epsom Wells — the Misanthrope — the Lancashire Witches, &c. comedies. There was a Charles Shadwell, either his son, or nephew, whose plays, especially the Fair Quaker of Deal, are mentioned with credit. He died 1726.

SHAKESPEARE, William, the illustrious poet of Nature, was born of a respectable family at Stratford on Avon, April, 1564. His father was engaged in the wool trade, and of ten children the poet was the eldest. He was early removed from the grammar school of Stratford, as business, and not learning, was to form the employment of his future life; but after being some time engaged in his father's trade, he married, at the age of 17, the daughter of Hathaway, a neighbouring farmer, and became master of a family, and a parent. At this time he unfortunately formed a connection with some dissipated companions, and in a thoughtless hour he accompanied them in deer stealing, in the park of sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford. The offence was again and again repeated, and a prosecution was consequently begun against the depredators; but the young poet, instead of conciliating the baronet by submission, wrote a ballad upon him, with such satirical bitterness, that it became unsafe for him to remain at Stratford. He fled therefore to London, to escape the law, and soon enrolled himself among the players. For a while he maintained himself in the character of an inferior performer; but the acquaintance which he formed with the stage was productive of the noblest consequences. Though his name appears in the list of the actors of those days, it is not ascertained that he rose to any eminence in the profession, as Mr. Rowe asserts, that the ghost in his own Hamlet was the highest character which he could venture to perform. He was, however, born not to act, but to delineate characters, not to play the hero, or the tyrant of a foreign muse, but to create characters, and beings of his own, and with the pencil of nature, to portray in the most glowing colors, the various emotions of the heart. Without patronage from the great, and an exile from his native town, the poet at last burst to eminence and fame. His plays became popular, several of them were performed before the court, and Elizabeth was so pleased with his Falstaff, in the two parts of Henry IV., that he wished to see the valiant knight in love, and the hint produced the inimitable drama of the Merry Wives of Windsor. These meritorious exertions for the entertainment of the court, and of the public, no doubt raised patrons to the poet; but little is known of them, and the name of lord Southampton only is mentioned, as distinguishing him with his friendship and confidence. It is said that in one instance the generous lord gave the poet one thousand pounds, to enable him to complete a purchase which he had made. For some years Shakespear, as allied with Ben Jonson, and the other wits and poets of the age, was manager of the play-house, house, and after he had acquired a competent fortune, he retired to his native town, where he lived respected and beloved by his neighbours. To the house which he purchased, he gave the name of New Place, and he had the good fortune to save it from the flames in the dreadful fire which nearly consumed the whole of the town in 1614. The mulberry tree which he planted in his garden afterwards became an object of veneration, and when cut down by the hands of an avaricious proprietor, the wood was fashioned into various utensils, which sold for a high price, and were preserved with more than common affection, as a precious memorial of the immortal planter. Shakespear made his will in the beginning of 1616, and died the 23d of April of the same year, in the 53d year of his age. He was buried in the tomb of his ancestors, on the north side of the chancel in Stratford great church, where the following Latin distich is written on the elegant monument against the wall, and the English lines on the grave-stone beneath:

Judicio Pylium, Genio Socratem, arte Maronem,
Terra tegit, populus mæret, Olympus habet.

Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust inclosed here.

Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones.

In 1740 a noble monument was raised to his honor in Westminster abbey, and that his fame, and not public charity, should contribute to the due homage, the collection was made from the admission to see his Julius Cæsar acted at Drury-lane, 28th April, 1738. Shakespear had three daughters, the youngest of whom was made, with her husband, executrix to his will, and inherited the best part of his estate. One of the daughters died young; Judith married Mr. Thomas Quincy, and Susannah, Dr. Hall, a physician. As an author, Shakespear deserves particular praise, as in originality, sublime conception, force and delineation, he has surpassed the poets of every age, and every country; and he therefore is properly the boast and the glory of England. In the midst, however, of his great and incomparable beauties, there are many blemishes, and while he scatters roses with a full and liberal hand, he is careless of the offensive weeds which accompany his exuberant profusion. His plays, of which it is scarce possible to trace the history, or to discover the date, except from a few scattered passages, have been often published, and by their own intrinsic merit, have given celebrity even to those who, as editors, have bestowed some labor in the elucidation of them. The first collection of them was in 1623, in folio, by two of his friends and fellow comedians, Heminge and Condell, and afterwards they engaged the attention of Rowe, in 1714, of Pope in 1721, of Theobald in 1726, of Hanmer in 1744, in 6 vols. 4to. of Warburton in 1747, of Dr. Johnson in 1765, of Steevens in 1766, of Capell in 1768, of Johnson and Steevens in 1778, besides more modern editions, and the publication of separate plays.

SHARP, James, a Scotch prelate, born of a good family in Banffshire, 1618. He was educated at Aberdeen, and early distinguished himself as an able opponent against the covenanters. He was in England, where he was noticed by Hammond, Taylor, and others, and in consequence of his great abilities was patronized by lords Rothes and Crauford, and obtained some preferment. He was the advocate of a presbyterian party for Scotland before Cromwell, and acquitted himself of his duty with great dexterity, and when Monk was commander in Scotland, he used the talents of Sharp in his attempts to settle the ecclesiastical affairs of the kingdom, and in soliciting the approbation of the exiled king to the proposed measures. At the restoration he became a convert to the principles of the church of England, and was made archbishop of St. Andrew's; but this elevation was considered as a shameful dereliction of his friends, and the covenanters were determined to sacrifice him to their resentment. His life was attempted in 1668, by a fanatic preacher; but in 1679, nine assassins proved more successful, and he was barbarously murdered on Magask-moor, three miles from St. Andrew's. He was then in his coach with his daughter, but neither her cries, nor his entreaties availed, and he fell, pierced with 22 wounds.

SHARP, John, an English prelate, born at Bradford, Yorkshire, 1644. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge, and after he had taken orders he became chaplain to sir Heneage Finch, attorney general. In 1672 he was made archdeacon of Berks, and in 1675, prebendary of Norwich, and then rector of St. Bartholomew near the Exchange, and afterwards of St. Giles' in the Fields. In 1679 he took his degree of D. D., and in 1681, was made dean of Norwich, by the interest of his friend Finch, now lord chancellor. In 1686 he was suspended, for preaching in favor of the Anglican church against popery; but though the bishop of London, who refused to pronounce against him, was himself suspended, the storm of disgrace passed away, and he was restored to favor, and in 1689, promoted to the deanery of Canerbur. Though he refused some of the bishopricks vacated in consequence of the refusal of the bishops to take the oath of allegiance to William, yet he consented to succeed to the see of York, on the death of Dr. Lamplugh. He preached the sermon on Anne's coronation, and was made privy counsellor. He died at Bath, 1713, and was buried in York cathedral, where an inscription by Dr. Smalridge records his merits. His sermons, in 7 vols. 8vo., have been published since his death, and are deservedly popular.

SHARP, Thomas, D. D. younger son of the preceding, was born in Yorkshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, 1728. He became chaplain to archbishop Dawes, of York, and obtained the rectory of Rothbury, Northumberland, a prebend of Durham, and the archdeaconry of Northumberland. He died 1758, aged 65. He is author of two Dissertations on the Etymology of the Hebrew Words Elohim and Berith, 8vo. — besides Discourses on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Tongue and Characters, &c. He was father to Granville Sharp, so eminently known as an elegant classical scholar, and as the author of Remarks on the Definitive Article in the Greek Testament, 12mo.

SHARPE, Gregory, D. D. F. R. A. S. S. an able divine, born in Yorkshire, 1713. From Hull school he came to Westminster, under Dr. Freind, and then completed his education at Aberdeen, under Dr. Blackwell. Soon after his return to England he took orders, and then became minister of Broadway chapel, St. James', and chaplain to the king, and next succeeded Dr. Nicolls, as master of the Temple. He died 8th Jan. 1771, highly respected for his virtues, and his extensive knowledge of oriental literature. He wrote a Review of the Controversy about the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 8vo. — Two Dissertations on the Origin of Language, and the Power of Letters, with a Hebrew Lexicon, 8vo. — Defence of Dr. Clarke against Leibnitz, 8vo. — Dissertation on the Origin and Structure of the Latin Tongue, 8vo. — Two Arguments in Favor of Christianity — Holberg's Introduction to Universal History, translated, 8vo. — Sermons, 8vo. &c.

SHARROCH, Robert, a clergyman's son, born at Adstock, Buckinghamshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL. D. 1661. He was prebendary and archdeacon of Winchester, and rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, and of Horewood, Bucks, and died 1684, much respected as a divine, and as a man. He wrote the History of the Propagation and Improvement of Vegetables, 8vo. — Hypothesis de Officiis secundum Humanæ Rationis Dictata, seu Naturæ Jus, unde Casus Conscientiæ, &c. 8vo. against Hobbes — Judicia, seu Legum Censuræ, de Variis Incontinentiæ Speciebus, &c. 8vo. — De Finibus Virtutis Christianæ, in several discourses, 4to.

SHAW, Thomas, D. D. a celebrated traveller, born at Kendal, Westmoreland, 1692, and educated there, and at Queen's college, Oxford. When he took orders, in 1719, he received the appointment of chaplain to the English factory of Algiers, and during his residence there, he made various excursions to examine the curiosities and antiquities of the country. In his absence he was chosen fellow of his college, and returned in 1733, and the next year took his doctor's degree, and in 1740, was appointed principal of Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hants. He was afterwards regius professor of Greek, and died 15th Aug. 1751. His travels were published at Oxford, in 1738, and have often been reprinted. They contain an interesting and accurate Account of Barbary and the Levant, and particularly of Egypt, and were ably vindicated by the author, against the attacks of Dr. Pococke.

SHAW, Cutburt, an English poet, son of a shoemaker, born at Ravensworth, Yorkshire, 1739. He was brought up at Scorton school, where he became assistant, and afterwards also at Darlington grammar school; but this laborious confinement was too much for his volatile spirit. He therefore removed to London, in quest of easier employment, and went afterwards to Bury, and engaged as actor in the Norwich company. In 1760 he performed Sir George Wealthy, in the Minor, under Foote, at the Hay-market, and the next year he appeared on the boards of Covent-garden, but met with little public encouragement. After a life of chequered adventures and misery, he died 1771, in very indigent circumstances. He was author of Liberty, 4to. 1756 — Odes on the Four Seasons, 4to. 1760, published under the name of Seymour — the Four Farthing Candles, 4to. 1762, a poem which attacked and ridiculed Lloyd, Churchill, Colman, and Shirley — the Race, a satirical poem on the chief poets of the time, 1766 — a Monody on his Wife whom he lost 1768, soon after his marriage. He wrote also an Account of the Beaume de Vie, a quack medicine, of which he was proprietor.

SHAW, John, a native of Durham, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and Brazen-nose. He was rector of Walton, Northumberland, in 1645, and at the restoration, obtained St. John's chapel, in Newcastle. He published, No Reformation of the established Religion, 8vo. — and some Tracts against Popery, and died 1689.

SHAW, Samuel, a native of Repton, Derbyshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was for some time master of Tamworth grammar school, and then removed to Moseley, and afterwards to Long Whetton, Leicestershire. Though ejected from his ecclesiastical preferment, for nonconformity, at the restoration, he obtained, in 1666, the school of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, where he collected a very respectable number of pupils. He died 1696, aged 61. He wrote the Voice of One crying in the Wilderness, 8vo. — Emanuel, a moral treatise, 8vo. — the True Christian's Test, or Meditations — a Latin Grammar — Words made visible, or Grammar and Rhetoric, and the Different Humors of Men, two comedies, acted by his pupils.

SHAW, Peter, author of the Practice of Physic, 2 vols. 8vo. — a Course of Chemistry, 4to. — an edition of Bacon's Works, 5 vols. 4to. was a member of the London college of physicians, and of the Royal society, and a respectable practitioner, and died 1763.

SHAW, Stebbing, a native of Stowe, Staffordshire, educated at Repton school, and Queen's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his master's degree. He travelled in 1787, through the Highlands of Scotland, and the next year visited the West of England, of which two journeys he published an account separately, of no great merit. In 1789, he was engaged in the Topographer, which contained Extracts from Curious Works preserved in the British Museum; but this work was discontinued in 1791. The first volume of his History of Staffordshire, a work of considerable merit, and of great labor, appeared 1798, folio, and three years after, the first part of the second volume was published. This respectable divine, who had, in 1799, succeeded to the living of Harthorn, Derbyshire, on his father's death, died 1803, aged only 41.

SHEBBEARE, John, a native of Bideford, Devon, educated there under Mr. Mudge, the master of the grammar school. He was apprenticed to an apothecary, and after being in business in Bristol, he removed, in 1740, to London. His politics, however, were unfriendly to the government, and he went to Paris, where he was admitted member of the academy of sciences, and presented to a doctor's degree. On his return return to England, he published the Marriage Act — and Lydia, or Filial Piety, two satirical novels of little merit; and in 1759, his seventh Letter to the People of England, exposed him to the resentment of government, and he was pilloried. On the accession of George III. he obtained a pension from lord Bute, and laying aside his attachment to the Stuart family, he defended the conduct of government in several pamphlets, especially at the beginning of the American war. He wrote also an History of Jersey, 2 vols. 8vo. 1771, in which he, with partial severity, attacks the conduct of the chief magistrate of the island — History of the Sumatrans, 2 vols. — Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea, 4 vols. — Practice of Physic, 2 vols. 8vo. — Letters on the English Nation, under the name of Angeloni, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He died 1788, aged 79.

SHEFFIELD, John, duke of Buckinghamshire, a respectable poet, and able statesman, born 1650. Though he lost his father when only nine years old, his education was not neglected; but assiduity brought to perfection, the naturally strong powers of his mind. After travelling into France, he went as volunteer in the second Dutch war, and afterwards made a campaign in the French service. He was next entrusted by Charles II. with the defence of Tangier, on the coast of Africa, which was threatened by the Moors. He soon became a great favorite at court, though his violent partiality for the princess Anne, afterwards queen, involved him in temporary disgrace. Under James II. he was privy counsellor, and lord chamberlain; and though he did not at first approve of the revolution, he afterwards warmly supported the measures for proclaiming William king, against those who wished to appoint Mary sole sovereign. Under Anne he was raised from the rank of an earl to that of duke of Normanby, and afterwards of Buckinghamshire, and was made steward of the household, and president of the council. On George's accession, he retired from the court, and died 24th Feb. 1720-1. He was buried in Westminster abbey, where the Latin inscription on his monument, written by himself, created some controversy, and drew upon him the reproach of scepticism. Though three times married, he left only one son, who died at Rome in 1753, and in whom the title became extinct. His works were elegantly published in 1729, in 2 vols. 8vo. the first of which contains his Essay on Poetry, his Rehearsal, and other poems, written on several occasions, and the second his prose works, consisting of essays, speeches, historical memoirs, dialogues, letters, &c. His learning and abilities have been greatly praised by his contemporaries; but later writers affect to speak with indifference of his compositions, and consider the adulation of Prior, Dryden, Addison, Garth, and Pope, as paid more to the nobleman, and the favorite of courts, than to the man of poetical merit, and deserved literary fame.

SHELDON, Gilbert, a distinguished prelate, born at Stanton, Staffordshire, 1598. He was admitted at Trinity college, Oxford, 1613, and in 1622 was elected fellow of All Souls. He afterwards took orders, and was made prebendary of Gloucester, and recommended by his patron, lord Coventry, to Charles

I. who gave him the living of Hackney, and other preferments. In 1635 he was elected warden of his college, and would have risen to higher honors had not the civil wars prevented his elevation. His attachment to the king, rendered him suspected by the parliament, and he was deprived of his preferment, imprisoned with Dr. Hammond, and, when set at liberty, forbidden to visit his royal master at the isle of Wight. He retired to Shelston, Derbyshire, and at the restoration recovered his ecclesiastical appointments, and was soon after made master of the Savoy, dean of the chapel royal, and successor to Juxon in the see of London. In 1663 he became primate, and in 1667, succeeded lord Clarendon as chancellor of Oxford. His freedom with the king, in advising him to put away his mistress, Barbara Villiers, proved so offensive, that he retired from the court, and spent the rest of his days at Croydon, where he died 9th Nov. 1677, aged near 80. His only publication was a sermon, preached before the king at Whitehall. His munificence was very great, he expended not less than 66,000*l.* in charitable purposes, and of his splendid donations, the theatre at Oxford is a very noble and lasting monument.

SHELLEY, George, writing master at Christ's hospital, was very eminent as a penman, and died 1736, aged about 70, at his house the Hand and Pen, Warwick lane. He published the Penman's Magazine, 1708, 32 plates engraved by Nutting — Natural Writing, 1714, 26 plates, engraved by Bickham — Moral Sentences for Schools, &c.

SHENSTONE, William, a celebrated English poet, born at Hales-Owen, Shropshire, Nov. 1714. He was taught to read by an old dame, whose kind services he has transmitted to posterity in his School Mistress, and from his earliest years he showed a great fondness for books. After being at Hales-Owen school, and at Solihul, under Mr. Crompton, he removed in 1732 to Pembroke college, Oxford, a respectable society, among which he derived both delight and advantage, as he continued his name among them 10 years, though he took no academical degree. After wandering about and visiting sometimes London, sometimes Bath, yet without forgetting the muses, he settled, 1745, on his estate, on the death of his friend Mr. Dolman, who had with indefatigable attention and strict integrity hitherto regulated his affairs. But his object here was not to increase his income, but to improve the beauties of his estate; and by degrees, through inattention and injudicious expence, he brought on himself pecuniary distress, and probably hastened his own death by the difficulties and anxieties which surrounded him. He was a lamp, as his biographer observes, that spent its oil in blazing. He was attacked by a putrid fever which proved fatal, at the Leafowes 11th Feb. 1763. He was buried in Hales-Owen church-yard by the side of his brother. The tenderness and generosity of his character are mentioned with deserved applause. He was kind to all within his influence, but so irascible, that, if once offended, he was not easily appeased. He was inattentive to economy, and careless of his expences, but his life was unstained by any crime. His mind was not very comprehensive, nor his curiosity active, and he esteemed light those parts of learning which he had not cultivated. His works have been published by Doddsley, in 3 vols. 8vo. consisting of 26 elegies, songs, odes, ballets, moral pieces, &c. written with ease, elegance, and simplicity. His epistolary correspondence afterwards appeared by Mr. Hull, in 2 vols. 8vo. and recollections of his life have been published by his venerable friend Mr. Graves.

SHEPREVE, John, an eminent scholar, born at Sugworth near Abingdon, Berks, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became Greek reader. In 1538 he succeeded Wakefield as university professor of Hebrew, and acquired great popularity as a lecturer. He had a most retentive memory, and wrote verses with astonishing rapidity, often 100 during the vacant hours of the day. He died at Amersham in Buckinghamshire 1542. He wrote Summa & Synopsis Novi Testamenti Ducentis Sexaginta Distichis Comprehensa, 8vo. — Hippolytus Ovidianæ Phædræ Respondens, &c. His nephew William, was a Roman catholic, who wrote some religious pieces and died at Rome 1593.

SHERARD OR SHERWOOD, William, an eminent botanist born in Leicestershire, and educated at Merchant-Taylors' school, and St John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and where he took the degree of bachelor of laws 1677. During his travels abroad as tutor to some noblemen, he visited the chief places of Europe, and was honored with the acquaintance of the great Boerhaave, of Tournefort, and other learned men. He obtained the appointment of consul at Smyrna in 1702, and during 16 years' residence in this distant region, he applied himself to form a valuable collection of the plants of Asia Minor and Greece, and to examine every thing remarkable as a subject of antiquity, or of natural history. After visiting England, he returned to the continent, and ascended the Alps in search of plants, where he nearly escaped being shot by a peasant, who mistook him for a wolf as he was lying on the ground. On his return to England he was attended by Dillenius, to whom he gave an honorable asylum at his seat at Eltham, and whom he appointed first professor in the botanical professorship which he founded at Oxford by the bequest of 3000l. He had been admitted doctor of laws at Oxford, in 1718, and he died 10 years after, much respected for his benevolence and liberality, as well as his great learning and extensive information. He published Herman's Paradisus Batavus, 4to. — Schola Botanica, 12mo. which appeared under the name of Wharton, and he made some valuable communications to the philosophical transactions. His brother James, was an apothecary, and afterwards a physician, who acquired also some celebrity as a botanist, and died 1741.

SHERBURN, Sir Edward, an English writer, born at St. Giles' Cripplegate, London, 1618, and educated at Mr. Furnaby's school. He travelled abroad, and, in 1641, succeeded on his father's death as clerk of the ordnance, from which he was soon afterwards ejected by the House of Lords for adhering to the king. He then joined the king, and was at the battle of Edgehill, and retired with Charles to Oxford, where he was made master of arts. When Oxford surrendered to the parliament, he, after suffering much in his property from parliamentary prosecution, went to London, and lived for some time in the Middle Temple. In 1652 he travelled abroad with Sir John Coventry, and at the restoration was re-instated in his clerkship, and knighted by Charles II. On the abdication of James II. he was deprived of his offices, and lived the rest of his life in retirement, and died 4th Nov. 1702, aged 85. He translated some of Seneca's tragedies into English, besides the Sphere of Manilius, Theocritus' 16th Idyllium, and poems and other translations.

SHEREBATOF, Prince, a Russian nobleman, author of a Journal of Peter the Great, 2 vols. 4to. — the Russian History from 1114 to 1472 — the Life of Peter the Great — History of Russia, from the earliest times, 4 vols. 4to. a work valuable for its accuracy and impartiality.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, a divine and poet, born about 1684, in the county of Cavan, Ireland. Though his parents were in indigent circumstances, he received by the kindness of his friends a good education, which he finished at Dublin college, where he took the degree of D. D. He afterwards kept a school in Dublin, and obtained celebrity by the number of his scholars, and the diligence and abilities with which he instructed them. He was presented by the friendship of Swift to a living in the South of Ireland, worth about 150l. per ann. but his sermon on these words "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof," preached at Cork on the anniversary of the first George's birth day, seemed so pointed at the politics of the times, that he ruined all hopes of further preferment. He afterwards exchanged his living for that of Dunboyne, and again exchanged that for the free school of Cavan; but his temper was fickle, and dissatisfied with the air, or more properly with the inhabitants of his new appointment, he sold it for 400l. He died some time after in indigent circumstances, 10th Sep. 1738, aged 55. Lord Corke describes him as better acquainted with books than men, as slovenly, indigent, and cheerful, yet in the midst of his poverty still a quibbler, a punster, a fiddler, and a wit, who never suffered the day to pass without a rebus, an anagram or a madrigal. He published a prose translation of Perfius, with judicious notes, 12mo. 1739, and his correspondence with Swift, &c. has also appeared in Swift's Miscellanies.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born at Quilca in Ireland, and educated at Westminster school and Dublin university, where he took the degree of B. A. He early showed a partiality for the stage, and in 1743, when 22 years old he personated Richard III. in the Smock-alley theatre, after which he exhibited on the boards of Covent-garden. In 1744, he undertook the management of the Dublin stage, but he met with such opposition in his attempts to reform abuses and to introduce regularity, that a conspiracy was formed against him, and a mob threatened the demolition of his theatre. Thus driven from Dublin he became an itinerant lecturer on elocution, and he acquired such celebrity in this new method of conveying instruction, that that not only his own university, but Cambridge, honored him with the degree of M. A. About 1760, he again had recourse to the stage, and appeared at Drury-lane theatre with great applause, and had the interest to obtain a pension from the government. In 1767, he engaged himself at the Haymarket, and for a while amused the town with his Attic Evening, an entertaining medley of singing, music, and repetition. He quitted the stage in 1776, to succeed Garrick as manager of Drury lane, but he resigned three years after, and again had recourse to his lectures and literary labors. He died at Margate 1788, aged 67. He was author of several works, the best known of which are, a Dictionary of the English language, in which he attempts to establish a permanent standard of pronunciation, 4to. and 2 vols. 12mo. — British Education, or the Source of the Disorders of Great Britain, 8vo. — Lectures on the Art of Reading, 8vo. — Dissertation on the Causes and Difficulties of learning the English Tongue, 4to. — Course of Lectures on Elocution, &c. 4to. — Life of Swift prefixed to his works, 8vo. — Elements of English, 12mo.

SHERIDAN, Frances, wife of the above, was granddaughter of sir Oliver Chamberlaine, and first distinguished herself as author of a pamphlet in the dispute which Mr. Sheridan had with the Dublin people with respect to his theatre. The little performance excited the attention of the manager, and he soon after married her. She proved a most amiable character in all the relations of life, and not only possessed very engaging manners, but joined the greatest benevolence of heart to respectable literary talents. After suffering much from a lingering illness, she retired for the recovery of her health too late to the south of France, and died at Blois 1767. Her Sydney Biddulph is a romance of great merit, and her Nourjahad deserves equal commendation. She wrote besides, two comedies, the Discovery — and the Dupe.

SHERLOCK, William, D. D. an English divine, born at Southwark 1641, and educated at Eton, and Peter house, Cambridge. In 1669, he obtained the rectory of St. George's Botolph lane, London, and a prebend of St. Paul's, and soon after was chosen master of the Temple. He was an able advocate for the church of England against the papists, but at the revolution he refused to take the oaths of allegiance, though he afterwards complied, and published an account and vindication of his conduct, which was severely censured by the nonjurors. In 1691, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and died at Hampstead, 19th June, 1707, and was buried in St. Paul's. He had a controversy with Dr. South about the Trinity, and also published various sermons, and some pamphlets on death and the last judgment. Burnet says that he was a clear and strong writer, but that the contempt he expressed for his adversaries made him pass for an insolent and haughty man.

SHERLOCK, Thomas, D. D. a learned prelate, son of the preceding, and born 1678. He was of Catherine hall, Cambridge, of which he was elected master. He was early eminent for his learning, and the policy and wisdom of his conduct at the head of a house procured him from Dr. Middleton the title of the principal champion and ornament of the church and university. He succeeded his father as master of the Temple, and this honorable appointment was held by father and son for more than 70 years. He displayed great abilities in the vindication of the corporation and test acts against the attacks of bishop Hoadly; and also in the defence of the use and intent of prophecy, in six discourses delivered at the Temple, in answer to Collins, and also in an able vindication of the miracle of Christ's resurrection against the attacks of Woolston. He wrote besides other controversial works; but his sermons in 4 vols. 8vo. are particularly valuable, as compositions of elegance, ingenuity, and erudition. In 1728, Dr. Sherlock was made bishop of Bangor, and in 1734, was translated to Salisbury, but in 1747, on the death of Potter, he refused the offer of the metropolitan see, in consequence of a severe illness under which he labored, though the following year he accepted the diocese of London. He died July, 18, 1761, in his 84th year. His private character was adorned with the purest virtues of benevolence and humanity. He sent 2000 copies of his excellent discourses to the colonies and settlements of America, and presented his valuable library to Catherine hall, where he founded a scholarship and the office of a librarian.

SHERLOCK, Richard, a native of Oxton in Werral, Cheshire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Trinity college, Dublin. He obtained some preferment in Ireland, but during the civil wars returned to England, and was made chaplain to one of the king's regiments. At the restoration he took the degree of D. D. at Dublin, and was presented by his patron lord Derby, to the valuable living of Winwick, Lancashire, where he died 20th June, 1689, aged 76. The best of his works are, the Practical Christian, 8vo. to the sixth edition of which his life is prefixed by bishop Wilson — Confessions, Meditations, and Prayers, for the Sacrament, 8vo. — pieces against the quakers, &c.

SHERRINGHAM, Robert, an able divine. After being ejected for attachment to the king from his fellowship of Gonvil and Caius college, Cambridge, he retired to Holland, but at the restoration he recovered his ecclesiastical honors. He wrote, de Anglorum Gentis Origine Disceptatio, 8vo. — the King's Supremacy asserted — Joman, a Hebrew book, translated into Latin, with notes, 4to. — sermons, 4to. &c.

SHERWIN, John Keyse, a wood cutter in Suffex, whose skill as an engraver was accidentally called forth at the house of Mr. Mitford. Viewing with astonishment the pieces which some of the family were engaged in drawing, he was asked to use the portcrayon, and his untutored hand produced such a drawing that the society of arts, to whom it was presented, voted him the silver medal. Removed from his humble occupation he became the pupil and the friend of Bartolozzi, and his engravings acquired deserved popularity. This excellent artist died 1790. The most admired of his engravings is, Moses among the bullrushes.

SHIPLEY, Jonathan, an English prelate, born 1714. He took his degrees at Christ-church, and upon entering tering into orders obtained a living, and in 1743, was made prebendary of Winchester. After travelling in 1745, with the duke of Cumberland as his chaplain, he was promoted in 1749 to a canonry at Christ-church, became dean of Winchester in 1760, and in 1769 bishop of St. Asaph. He was author of some elegant verses on the death of queen Caroline, and published besides, some poems, and sermons preached on public occasions, and died 1788.

SHIRLEY, fir Antony, a native of Wiston, Suffex, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of All Souls. He studied the law, but afterwards accompanied fir Philip Sydney to the Low Countries, and in 1596, he was sent to America by queen Elizabeth. He next attended Essex when lord lieutenant of Ireland, and was knighted there, after which he went abroad, and became so much respected for his knowledge and acquirements that the king of Spain created him a grandee of the kingdom, and appointed him admiral of his fleet. James I. jealous of these honors bestowed on one of his subjects, recalled him home, but he had the boldness to refuse, and died in Spain 1640, aged 75. He was author of a Voyage to America, inserted in Hackluyt's collection — Account of Muley Hamet's Elevation to the Kingdom of Morocco, &c. 4to. — History of his Travels into Persia, 4to. — Voyage over the Caspian and through Russia, in Purcha's Pilgrims — History of his Ambassies, fol. &c. His brother Robert accompanied him into Persia and settled there, and became so great a favorite at court, that the emperor not only employed him as his ambassador to Poland and to England, but gave him his own niece in marriage, and loaded him with honors and opulence. He died it is said, of a broken heart on his return to Persia, 23d July, 1627, aged 63, because he had been treated as an impostor at the English court by his predecessor the Persian ambassador, and because he was not able to receive in Persia that satisfaction which he expected. His widow came to Europe and fixed her residence at Rome.

SHIRLEY, Thomas, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Westminster, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He took his medical degrees in France, and became physician to Charles II. and died 1678. He was author of a philosophical essay on the probable causes whence stones are produced in the greater world, &c. 8vo. a curious performance.

SHIRLEY, James, an English dramatic writer and poet, born in St. Mary Wool-church parish, London, 1594. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' and at St. John's college, Oxford, which he left without a degree to go to Cambridge, where he took his degrees. He afterwards took orders and served a cure near St. Alban's, but changed his religion for that of Rome, and then settled at St. Alban's where he kept a school, from which he removed to London. There he devoted himself to writing plays, and was patronized by Charles's queen, but when the civil wars broke out, and plays became unpopular among the republican fanatics, he had recourse to education for support, and kept a school at White-friars with some reputation. The fire of London which robbed him of his property proved so terrific to him that both himself and his wife died in consequence of fright within 24 hours of each other, and were buried in the same grave, 29th Oct. 1669. He wrote 37 plays, besides a volume of poems, and was patronized by lord Newcastle. There was a Henry Shirley who lived in his time, and wrote the Martyred Soldier, a tragedy, &c.

SHORE, Jane, wife of Matthew Shore, a goldsmith in Lombard street, is known in history as the mistress of the voluptuous Edward IV. To great and fascinating personal charms she added some of the best qualities of the heart, and though she had not virtue enough to withstand temptation, she was benevolent and humane in the midst of a debauched court. After the king's death she lived with lord Hastings, and when he fell under the tyranny of the third Richard, she was seized as an accomplice in his pretended conspiracy, and felt all the resentment of the usurper. She was accused of witch-craft, and did open penance for her adulteries, and was also plundered of her property by the artful Richard. She survived her misfortunes, and was seen by fir Thomas More in the reign of Henry VIII. poor, decrepid, and shrivelled, without the least traces of that beauty which once commanded the admiration of a court. She perished of hunger in a ditch called from her Shoreditch, though Stow relates that that street bore the name before her time.

SHOVEL, fir Cloudefley, a celebrated English admiral, born of obscure parents about 1650. He was apprentice to some mean trade, which he quitted for the sea, and by application, bravery, and steadiness, he gradually rose from a cabin boy under fir Christopher Mynns to consequence and command. He served under fir John Narborough at the attack on Tripoli 1674, and by being sent on shore had the opportunity, while negotiating with the dey, of observing the weak parts of the enemy's fortifications and defence, and in consequence directed the blow which completely destroyed all their ships. This brave conduct procured him the command of a ship; and, after other eminent services, especially in Bantry bay, he was knighted by king William at Portsmouth, and conveyed, in 1690, that king and his army into Ireland. He was engaged as one of the rear admirals at the battle of la Hogue, and afterwards had an important command before Vigo, and in the Mediterranean before Malaga. In 1705, he was again sent against Spain, and after an unsuccessful attack upon Toulon he returned home. His fleet, however, unfortunately was wrecked on the Scilly islands, 22d Oct. 1705, and in his ship, the Association, perished with him his sons-in-law, and other persons of distinction. His body was next day cast on shore, and robbed of a ring by some fishermen, who buried him in the sand. The ring discovered his quality, the fishermen pointed out where they had deposited the body, which was dug up and brought to Portsmouth, and thence conveyed to London and buried in Westminster abbey, where a monument by the queen's directions records his meritorious services. He married his patron fir John Narborough's widow, by whom he left two daughters.

SHOWER, John, a nonconformist divine, educated by Doolittle, Islington, whom he succeeded in his school.

school. He was minister of Jewin street congregation 1687, and died at Hoxton, 1718, aged 58. He wrote Sacramental Sermons — Reflections on Time and Eternity, works of great merit.

SHREWSBURY, Elizabeth, countess of, daughter of John Hardwich esq. of Derbyshire, married at the age of 14 Mr. Barley, and after a widowhood of 12 years William Cavendish of Chatworth, the ancestor of the Devonshire family. She had three sons, one of whom was earl of Devonshire, and the other father to the duke of Newcastle, and three daughters, one of whom was ancestor to the Pierreponts dukes of Kingston and another wife of Charles duke of Lenox uncle to James I. Her third husband was sir William St. Low, and her fourth lord Shrewsbury. She was for 17 years the keeper of Mary queen of Scots, and died 1607, aged 87, and was buried in All-Hallows church, Derby.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, rector of Shelton, Norfolk, canon of Canterbury, and chaplain to the king, was author of an History of the World Sacred and Profane, Introductory to Prideaux's Connections — and the Creation and the Fall of Man, and died 1754.

SHUTE, Josias, archdeacon of Colchester, rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, was author of a folio volume of sermons on the 16th chapter of Genesis. He was a most eloquent preacher, and much admired, but he was exposed to great persecution during the civil wars for his attachment to the king. He died 1643.

SHUTER, Edward, a good actor, son of a chairman. From a tapster in a public house, and a marker at a billiard table, he was engaged by Rich in some of the humbler offices of the theatre of Covent-garden, from which he rose by application to consequence and the greatest popularity. His abilities appeared in low comedy and characteristic humor, and his Justice Clack, and his Midas, were long and deservedly popular characters. He died 1776.

SIBBALD, sir Robert, a physician, born near Leslie, Fifeshire 1643, and educated at St. Andrew's. He travelled into France, and on his return to Scotland projected the establishment of the college of physicians Edinburgh, and the plantation of the botanical gardens. In 1686, he embraced the catholic religion, but afterwards read his recantation in Liberton church, with great contrition for his folly. He was the first professor of medicine at Edinburgh, and in consequence of his great reputation was knighted by Charles II. He died 1720. He was author of Scotia Illustrata, fol. — Phalainologia Nova, 4to. — History of the Sheriffdom of Fife and Kinross — Miscellanea Quædam Eruditæ Antiquitatis, 1710 — and contributions to the philosophical transactions.

SIBRECHTS, John, a painter, born at Antwerp. He lived for some time in London, where his abilities were greatly patronized, and died 1703, aged 78. His landscapes and cattle possessed peculiar beauty.

SIBTHORPE, Robert, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at Oxford. He became rector of Water Stratford, Buckinghamshire, and vicar of Brackley, Northamptonshire, and by his zeal in the cause of Charles I. and by the eloquence of his preaching he obtained a prebend in Peterborough cathedral, and Burton Latimer's rectory, Northamptonshire. These preferments were taken from him after the destruction of royalty, and his discourses were exposed to the severest censures of the house of commons. He died 1662.

SIBTHORPE, John, a native of Lincolnshire, educated at Oxford, where he took his medical degrees, and where he succeeded his father Dr. Humphrey Sibthorpe, as professor of botany. In his zeal in the service of botany he travelled twice to Greece, and made a valuable collection of curious plants, which will appear before the public in a splendid form under the title of Flora Græca. Dr. Sibthorpe published Flora Oxoniensis, and died 1796, leaving a handsome bequest to the university for the encouragement of his favorite science.

SICINIUS DENTATUS, a warrior, surnamed from his valor the Roman Achilles. He won 121 battles, and received 45 honorable wounds in the service of his country. He was murdered by App. Claudius, B. C. 405.

SICOLANTE, Girolamo, a native of Sermoneta in Italy, distinguished as a landscape and historical painter. He died 1550, aged 46.

SIDNEY, Henry, an English statesman, descended from a noble family in Surrey. He was a student of New college, Oxford, 1513, and afterwards became the favorite of Edward VI. who knighted and employed him as ambassador to France. Under Mary he was made collector of the revenues in Ireland, and on Elizabeth's accession he became lord president of the marches of Wales, and knight of the garter, and in 1568, was sent to Ireland as lord deputy to the queen. He was a man of great integrity, and married Mary, eldest daughter of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland. He died 1586, and was buried at Penshurst in Kent, a manor which had been formerly granted to him by the queen. He promoted the printing of the Irish statutes, while in the government of the country. Some of his letters to his son have been published.

SIDNEY, sir Philip, son of the above, was born at Penshurst, 1554, and named Philip in honor of the king of Spain, the husband of queen Mary. He was educated at Christ-church, Oxford, and at the age of 17 he began his travels. At Paris he escaped the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew by flying into the house of the English ambassador, and afterwards extended his travels to Germany, and returned to England after an absence of four years. In 1576 he was sent by the queen to Rodolph, emperor of Germany, and on his return visited Don John of Austria, and William, prince of Orange, by both of whom he was received with great courtesy. In 1579 he ventured to oppose the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou, and soon after, in consequence of a quarrel with Vere, earl of Oxford, he absented himself from the court, and in his retirement wrote his famous romance, called Arcadia. He was in 1582 knighted, and three years after, while he meditated an expedition to America with Drake, he was sent by the queen to take upon himself the government of Flushing.

ing. The next year he surprized Axil, and behaved with such prudence, moderation, and wisdom, that he was proposed as a fit candidate for the vacant crown of Poland, but Elizabeth opposed it, observing, that England ought not to lose the jewel of the times. This brave man received a mortal wound in the thigh, at the battle of Zutphen, 22d Sept. 1586, and was carried to Arnheim, where he expired the 16th Oct. following. As he lay bleeding on the field of battle, and was going to taste a bottle of wine which his attendants had procured to refresh him, he saw a wounded soldier carried by, and casting a longing look on the liquor, upon which he ordered it to be given to him, adding, "poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine!" His body was brought home, and buried in great funeral pomp in St. Paul's cathedral; but though no monument was placed over him, his memory was embalmed by an epitaph written in his honor by king James, and by verses from the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. This Marcellus of England was universally respected as a statesman, soldier, and scholar, and the panegyrics passed on him in his time have been re-echoed by the succeeding ages. Besides his popular Arcadia, which passed through eight editions before the end of 1633, he wrote an Apology for Poetry, 4to. — sonnets — Ourania, a poem — and other pieces.

SIDNEY, Algernon, an English gentleman, second son of Robert, earl of Leicester, by Dorothy, daughter of the earl of Northumberland, was born 1617. In the civil war he espoused the party of the parliament, and was colonel in the army, and one of the king's judges, though he did not sit on the tribunal. Like Brutus, whom he made his model, he was the ardent friend of a pure republic, and therefore retired in disgust on Cromwell's usurpation. He was, however, in 1659, employed as ambassador to Copenhagen, to mediate a peace between the kings of Denmark and Sweden, but at the restoration he refused to return, and continued abroad till 1677. He was then permitted to return, and obtained the king's pardon, on condition of demeaning himself in a quiet and obedient manner. He was in 1683 accused as being concerned in the Rye-house plot, and was arraigned in November before judge Jeffreys, and found guilty. He appealed to the king, and complained of the partiality of the judge, who had tried him with a packed-up jury, but all was in vain, and he was beheaded on Tower-hill, 7th Dec. 1683. His attainder was reversed as cruel and illegal in the first year of William and Mary. This strong republican was, as Burnet observes, a man of extraordinary courage, steady even to obiternity, sincere, but of a temper that could not bear contradiction, a christian in principle, but averse to all public worship, and an enemy to every thing that looked like monarchy. He left behind him Discourses upon Government, published 1698 and 1704, a work of such merit, that some authors declare, that the composition fully compensates for the loss of Cicero's six books de Republicâ.

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, a Roman, born at Lyons, and after holding various civil offices, raised to the see of Auvergne against his will. He was a pious and exemplary prelate, and died 488, aged about 58. He left epistles, poems, &c. edited 1652, 4to.

SIGEBERT, king of the East Angles, mentioned with great praise by Bede, on account of his learning and piety. He was a munificent prince, and founded several churches, schools, and monasteries, and at last abdicated the throne to live in a cell at Burgh castle, Suffolk. He was assassinated 642.

SIGEBERT, third son of Clotaire I. inherited the kingdom of Austrasia, and married Brunehaut. He was a valiant prince, and was successful against the Huns, who invaded his kingdom, and against Chilperic, king of Soissons, his brother-in-law. He was assassinated 575, by the intrigues of Fredegonde, the wife of Chilperic.

SIGEBERT the Younger, son and successor of Dagobert in the kingdom of Austrasia, died 650, aged 20.

SIGISMUND, king of Burgundy, after his father Gondebald, 516, abjured the Arian principles of his father. He was engaged in war with Clodomir, son of Clovis, who took him, and threw him into a well, to perish, with his wife and family, at Orleans, 523.

SIGISMUND, son of Charles IV. was born 1368. He was made king of Hungary, 1386, and emperor of Germany, 1410. After re-establishing, by wise regulations, the peace of the empire, he prevailed upon pope John XXIII. to tranquillize the church by the calling of a council, which was to sit at Constance. Sigismund visited France and England to facilitate the peaceful measures which he proposed to establish, and was present at the deliberations of the council, which assembled in 1414, and consisted of 18,000 ecclesiastics, and 16,000 nobles. His conduct, however, was treacherous in suffering John Huss and Jerome of Prague, to be thrown into the flames, after he had solemnly granted them a safe passport; and this violation of faith armed against him the bravest of his subjects. The Hussites, headed by the brave Ziska, obtained a victory over the forces of the emperor, 1419, and sixteen years elapsed in civil discord and bloodshed, before peace could be restored in Germany. Sigismund died 8th Dec. 1437, aged 70.

SIGISMUND I. king of Poland, surnamed the Great, son of Casimir IV. was elected to the throne, 1507. After establishing order in his dominions, and restoring Poland to its ancient glory, he defeated the Muscovites, and drove them from Lithuania, and afterwards retook from the Teutonic knights the cities of Poland which they had seized, and in 1531 cut to pieces an army of Wallachians that had invaded his territories. This brave and wise prince died 1548, universally respected, aged 82.

SIGISMUND II. son and successor of the preceding, was surnamed Augustus, because born in the month of August. He offended his subjects by elevating to the throne Barba Radzivil, his mistress, whom he had married privately, and he reconciled the nobles only by by permitting them to send their sons to be educated in the universities of Germany, which, before his reign, was not permitted. Heretical opinions were thus introduced into the kingdom, which he was not able to repress. He died 7th July, 1572, and as he had no issue, the race of the Jagellons became extinct. He was succeeded by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. of France.

SIGISMUND III. son of John III. king of Sweden, ascended the Polish throne 1587, to the exclusion of Maximilian of Austria, who had been elected by some of the nobles. On his father's death, 1594, he went to Sweden to possess himself of the crown; but as he was a determined catholic, the Swedes, who favored the protestant principles, placed, in 1604, his uncle Charles, the duke of Sudermania, on the throne. These civil dissensions long distracted the kingdom, and by the valor of Gustavus Adolphus, Sigismund was defeated; though in Poland he obtained some advantages over the Muscovites and the Tartars, who had made war against him. He died 1632, aged 66.

SIGNORELLI, Luca, a painter, born at Cortona, 1439. His pictures of naked bodies were so correct and beautiful, that Michael Angelo has copied many of his figures in his Last Judgment. He died very rich, 1521.

SIGONIUS, Carolus, a learned Italian, born at Modena, 1525. His father intended him for a physician, but he preferred literature, to which he assiduously devoted himself. He was professor of Greek at Venice, Padua, and Bologna. He died 1584, aged 60. He wrote several books, the best known of which are, his excellent treatise de Republicâ Hebræorum — de Republicâ Atheniensium — Historia de Occidentis Imperio — de Regno Italiæ — an Ecclesiastical History, Milan, 2 vols. 4to. 1734, &c.

SILHOVETTE, Stephen de, a native of Limoges, who, by his abilities, became master of requests to the duke of Orleans, and afterwards, by the influence of his patron, comptroller-general and prime minister, 1759. His wife attempts, however, to introduce order and economy in the government were ridiculed by the fickle nation, and he retired nine months after from the helm of the state to private life. He died at his seat of Bry-sur-Marne, 20th Jan. 1767, aged 58. He is author of General Ideas on the Chinese Government, 4to. — Political Reflections on Great Princes, from the Spanish of Gracian, 4to. — a translation of Pope's Essay on Man, 12mo. — Miscellanies, &c. from Pope — treatise on Happiness — Union of Religion and Politics, from Warburton, 2 vols. 12mo.

SILIUS ITALICUS, Caius, a Roman poet, made consul by Domitian. He wrote an indifferent poem on the second Punic war, and died A. D. 74, aged 75. He paid particular attention to Virgil's tomb, which was on his estate.

SILVA, John Baptist, a native of Bourdeaux, of Jewish origin. He abandoned the religion of his parents, and studied medicine at Montpellier and Paris, and acquired such celebrity, that the empress of Russia made him liberal offers to settle in her dominions, which he declined. He died at Paris, 18th Aug. 1744, aged 61. He was author of a treatise on the Use of Bleeding, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. — Dissertations and Consultations of Chirac and Silva, 3 vols. 12mo. Memoirs of his Life were published by Bruhier.

SILVESTER I. made pope 314, opposed the Donatists at the councils of Arles and Nice, and labored earnestly to establish order and tranquillity in the church. Under him the Arian schism began first to arise. He died 335.

SILVESTER II. Gerbert, was born of obscure parents at Auvergne. He was educated at the monastery of Aurillac; but the ignorance and the consequent jealousy of his ecclesiastical brothers, drove him to Spain, where his abilities were noticed by the duke of Barcelona, who took him into Italy. Here he was recommended to the emperor Otho, who appointed him abbot of Bobio; but this office he soon quitted and became preceptor to Otho III. He was afterwards in the service of the archbishop of Rheims, and then selected by Hugh Capet to preside over the education of his son Robert, and in reward for his attention, he was, in 992, raised to the see of Rheims. He afterwards became archbishop of Ravenna, and on the death of Gregory V. he was, by the interest of Otho, placed in the papal chair, 999. He died 1003. He was a very learned man, and chiefly skilled in mathematics.

SILVESTER, Israel, an engraver, born at Nancy. His pieces, especially landscapes, were much admired, and he was employed by Lewis XIV. to embellish his palaces with the representation of his conquests. He also taught drawing to the dauphin, and died at Paris, 1691, aged 70.

SILVESTER, Louis, a painter, born at Paris. He was the pupil of Le Brun, and of Boullongne, and evinced superior powers in his profession. After distinguishing himself at home, he was invited by the king of Poland to Dresden, and was honored with the rank of nobility, and the office of director of the royal academy of painting. After residing 24 years in Saxony, and adorning the palaces of his patron with the noblest works of his pencil, he returned to Paris, and was received with great respect by the king. He died 14th April 1760, aged 85.

SIMEON STYLITES, a native of Cilicia, who, in his 13th year, left the employment of shepherd to enter a monastery. With the most romantic zeal of religious frenzy, he became the founder of a new sect of devotees, and exhibited himself to his astonished followers on the top of a column 60 feet high, on the mountains of Syria. He died 461, aged 69, of which he had passed 47 on the top of a column exposed to the inclemencies of the air, and of the seasons, and often supporting himself for hours and for days on one foot in his elevated situation. This new mode of mortification had several followers, who were called from the column, Stylites, and who, like their founder, were said to have frequent visions and communications with heaven.

SIMEON METAPHRASTES, a native of Constantinople, secretary of state to Leo and to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and author of the Lives of Saints, which he composed at the request of his imperial patron in the 10th century. His work has been translated into French and Latin. He wrote also some verses, preserved in the Corpus Poetarum Græc.

SIMIANE, Charles John Baptist de, marquis of Pianese, after serving in the armies of the duke of Savoy, retired to Turin, where he died 1677. He is author of a treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion, in Italian, translated into French by Bouhours — Piissimi in Deum Affectus, &c.

SIMLER, Johas, a native of Zurich in Switzerland, author of an Abridgment of Gefner's Bibliotheca folio — of a treatise of Helvetiorum Republica, 12mo. — Vallesiæ Descriptio, and other works. He was an able protestant divine, and died at Zurich, 1576, aged 45. — There was an eminent portrait painter, of the same family, called John, who was also born at Zurich, and died at Stein on the Rhine, 1748, aged 55.

SIMON MACCABÆUS, high priest and ruler of the Jews, 143 B. C. signalized his valor under his brothers Judas and Jonathan, and bravely supported his countrymen against the invasions of the Tyrians and Sidonians. He was unanimously elected chief of his nation at Jerusalem, and immediately employed himself in repairing the fortifications of the cities of Judæa, and in obtaining from Demetrius, king of Syria, the confirmation of the privileges and independence of his nation. After defeating the troops of Antiochus Soter, he was basely murdered with his two sons by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, who had invited him to a feast, B. C. 135.

SIMON, surnamed Zelotes, an apostle of our Saviour, who, according to some, preached the gospel in Egypt, Libya, and Mauritania, and at last suffered martyrdom in Persia.

SIMON, called the brother of Christ, was son of Cleophas, and made bishop of Jerusalem after James, A. D. 62. He was crucified under Trajan, A. D. 107.

SIMON MAGUS, a native of Samaria, who was baptized by Philip. Seeing the miracles wrought by the apostles, he wished to obtain the same power, and offered them money, but Peter rejected his bribes, and passed a curse upon him. From this circumstance, the appellation of Simoniac is applied to those who sell or purchase spiritual things. Afterwards Simon became head of a sect, and maintained that the divinity had abandoned the government of the world to a certain number of supernatural beings, whom he called Æons. He next went to Rome, where he acquired great celebrity, and, as some of the ecclesiastical writers assert, he raised himself, by his magical powers, into the air, when, by the prayer of St. Peter, he was precipitated to the ground, and broke his legs.

SIMON, Claude Francis, a printer of Paris, who died there 1767, aged 55. He was author of the Knowledge of Mythology, a work, in the first edition, very offensive and licentious, and he wrote besides Minos — and Reciprocal Confidence, two comedies — Memoirs of countess Horneville, a romance, 2 vols. 12mo.

— Memoirs of Duguay Trouin, 4to. He also edited Virgil, Terence, and other classics.

SIMON, Thomas, an English engraver in the age of Charles I. He was brought up under Briort, the French artist, and excelled in his profession. The great seal of Cromwell, and the arms of the Commonwealth, were cut by him in a very delicate manner. His brother Abraham, was for some time in the service of Christina, queen of Sweden, and afterwards of Charles II. and died soon after the revolution. He was intended for the church, but he preferred the bent of his genius, and he acquired both opulence and celebrity as a modeller in wax.

SIMON, Richard, a French critic, born at Dieppe, 1638. He became priest of the oratory, which he quitted to study at Paris, but to which he returned about 1660. He again left that society in 1678, and died at Dieppe, April, 1712. He was a man of great critical powers, of extensive learning, and strong judgment. His works are Critical History of the Old Testament, 1678, suppressed by the intrigues of the Port Royal — History of the Rise and Progress of Ecclesiastical Revenues, 1684, edited again 1709, 2 vols. 12mo. — Disquisitiones Criticæ de Variis per Diversa Loca & Tempora Bibliorum Editionibus — Answers to Le Clerc, &c. — Critical Dissertation on Dupin's Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, &c. — Critical History of the New Testament, 4to. — a New select Library, pointing out good books in various kinds of literature, &c. — Critical History of the Versions of the New Testament — the New Testament translated into French with Critical Notes, &c. 2 vols 8vo. &c.

SIMON of Durham, a monk of Whitby convent, and afterwards of Durham, in the reign of Edward III. He wrote a Chronicle, which was published at Oxford by Hearne. He died about 1356.

SIMONET, Edmund, a jesuit, born at Langres, 1662. He was professor of philosophy and theology at Rheims, and at Pont-a-Mousson, where he died 1733. He wrote Institutiones Theologicæ ad Usum Seminariorum, 3 vols. folio, Venice, 1731.

SIMONIDES, a poet and philosopher of Cos. His poetry which was chiefly elegiac, was much admired. He flourished about 480 B. C. Only fragments of his works remain.

SIMONNEAU, Charles, a native of Orleans, who studied the art of designing under Coypel. He acquired some celebrity as an engraver, and died at Paris, 1728, aged 89. His medals, which were engraved for the medallic history of Lewis XIV. were much admired.

SIMONNEAU, Lewis, an engraver of eminence, who published the History of Printing and Engraving, 1694 — and the History of other Arts, &c. from 1694 to 1710, 2 vols. folio, with 168 plates, works of merit.

SIMPLICIUS, a native of Phrygia, known as a peripatetic philosopher in the fifth century, and for his Commentaries on Aristotle and Epictetus.

SIMPSON, Edward, a native of Totenham, Middlesex, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of D. D. He died 1652, at his rectory rectory of Eastling, Kent. He was author of Universal Chronology, in Latin, 1652, reprinted at Leyden, 1739, and Amsterdam, 1752.

SIMPSON, Christopher, author of a Compendium of Practical Music, 8vo. a work of merit, died at the house of his friend and patron, sir Robert Bolles, 1662.

SIMPSON, Thomas, an eminent mathematician, born at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, 20th Aug. 1710. As he was intended for the profession of his father, who was a stuff-weaver, he was taught only to read; but the loom was too humble an occupation for him, and the solar eclipse of 1724 roused all his attention to know and to understand how these extraordinary phenomena could be predicted. An accidental acquaintance with an itinerant pedlar, who pretended to tell fortunes and cast nativities, gave him opportunities of improving himself, and from the books which the modern sage lent him, from Cocker's Arithmetic, a book of Partridge's, &c. he derived much information, and began himself to be the oracle of Bosworth, and its environs. Leaving Leicestershire, he came to London, and worked for some time in Spital-fields, and by his industry was enabled not only to maintain his wife and children, but to purchase books, and to advance his knowledge of mathematics. He next engaged in teaching mathematics, and soon after published Proposals for a New treatise of Fluxions, &c. which at last appeared in 1737. He continued to write on mathematical subjects, and became so well known, that in 1743 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Woolwich academy, and some time after elected member of the Royal society. In his new appointment he devoted himself with such ardor to the improvement of his pupils, that he gained general esteem by his mildness and the clear and distinct manner of his instruction. His health, however, was weak, and the intenseness of his application still enfeebled it more, so that he sunk into such lowness of spirits, that the dropping of a tea-cup terrified him as much as if a house had tumbled down upon him. In this delicate state he was recommended to try the air of his native town; but on his arrival at Bosworth, he gradually grew worse, and died 14th May, 1761. His widow honorably received a pension from government, and handsome apartments near the academy of Woolwich. His other works are, a treatise on the Nature and Laws of Chance, 4to. — Essays on Curious Subjects in Mathematics, 4to. 1740 — the Doctrine of Annuities and Reversions, &c. with useful tables, 1742, with an Appendix the next year, in answer to de Moivre's objections — Mathematical Dissertations, &c. — a treatise of Algebra — Elements of Geometry — Trigonometry, Plain and Spherical — the Doctrine and Application of Fluxions — Miscellaneous tracts, &c. — papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c.

SIMPSON, John, a Scotch divine, born near Dumfries, and educated at Glasgow, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1716 he became professor of divinity; but in his lectures he denied the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, which excited great persecution against him for 10 years, and at last procured his deposition and excommunication from the Scotch church. Queen Caroline had some concern for his sufferings, and procured for him a pension equal to his salary. He died at Edinburgh, 1744, aged 65.

SIMPSON, Robert, an able mathematician, born at Hamilton, 1695, and educated at Glasgow university, where he took his degrees in medicine. As he did not succeed in his profession, he applied himself to mathematics, for which he had strong natural abilities, and was appointed mathematical professor at Glasgow, where he died 1765. He published a treatise on Conic Sections — a valuable edition of Euclid, &c. His posthumous works appeared at Glasgow, 1776, in 4to.

SINGLIN, Anthony, a French ecclesiastic, born at Paris. He was at the head of the abbey of Port-Royal, and was distinguished for his learning and piety. He died 1664. He wrote Christian Instructions on the Mysteries of Religion, &c. 5 vols. 8vo. a work of merit — Letters, &c.

SIRANI, John Andrew, a painter of Bologna. He was one of the most illustrious of Guido's pupils. His last supper was much admired. He died 1670, aged 60. His daughter Elizabeth excelled as an historical painter. She died 1664.

SIRI, Vittorio, an Italian, who settled at Paris, where he became historiographer to the king, and abbot of Vallemagne. He published Mercury, an historical journal, from 1635 to 1649, 15 vols. He wrote also Memoire Recondite, 3 vols. 4to. &c. and died at Paris, 1685, aged 77.

SIRIES, Violante Beatrice, a native of Florence, who studied painting under John Fratellini, and acquired celebrity and opulence by her portraits, especially those of the grand duke and of the imperial family at Florence. She died about 1760, aged 50.

SIRLET, Flavius, a celebrated engraver on precious stones, who died at Rome, 1737. He also painted, but his performances as an engraver are particularly admired, especially his representation of the famous groupe of Laocoon, on an amethyst.

SIRMOND, James, an eminent French jesuit, born at Riom, 1559. He was sent by the jesuits of his college at Billom, to Paris, where he taught Greek and Latin, and acquired so perfect a knowledge of these languages, that his style for elegance and animation has been universally admired. In 1590 he removed to Rome by order of the general of his society, Aquaviva, and undertook the office of his secretary, in which he was laboriously employed for 16 years. During his residence at Rome, he became the friend and the counsellor of all the men of learning, and assiduously applied himself to the study of antiquities, and to the examination of MSS. In 1606 he returned to Paris, but Urban VIII. sensible of his merits, sent for him to return to Rome, which Lewis XIII. would not permit. In 1637 he was made confessor to the king of France, after whose death in 1643 he again returned with pleasure to the tranquillity of an humble life. In 1645 he was at Rome at the appointment of a general of his order, and on his return to France, in consequence of extraordinary exertions to support his opinions in the Jesuits' college, he heated himself too much, which brought on a jaundice, and an improper secretion of bile, of which he soon after died, Oct. 7th, 1651, aged 92. He wrote various pieces on theological subjects, and edited the works of Marcellinus, Theodoret, and Hincmar, the councils of France, &c. amounting to 15 vols. folio. He also assisted Baronius in the composition of his Annals. His character, as drawn by Dupin, is that of an amiable and virtuous man, not more distinguished by extensive erudition than by the most benevolent and mild qualities of the heart. His nephew John, was historiographer of France, and member of the academy, and died 1649. He wrote Latin poems — the Life of cardinal d'Amboise, 8vo. &c.

SIXTUS I. pope after Alexander I. 119, died at the end of the year 127.

SIXTUS II. an Athenian, pope after Stephen, 267. He suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Valerian.

SIXTUS III. pope after Celestinus I. 432, engaged in effecting a reconciliation among the divided churches of the East, and died about 440.

SIXTUS IV. Francis Albecola, son of a fisherman, of Celles in the state of Genoa, entered into the order of the Cordeliers, and after being professor of divinity at Padua, and in other Italian universities, he was made provincial of his society. He was raised to the rank of cardinal by Paul II. after whose death he succeeded to the popedom, 1471. He attempted to make a crusade against the infidels, but without success. In 1476 he granted, by a bull, immunities to those who celebrated the feast of the immaculate conception of the Virgin. He was author of some theological tracts, and a liberal patron of the learned, but so easy of access, that he granted often favors to the unworthy, and was imprudently lavish in his kindnesses to his nephews. He died 13th Aug. 1482, aged 71.

SIXTUS V. Felix Peretti, pope, was son of a gardener, and was born Dec. 1521, in the march of Ancona. For some time he kept the sheep and the swine of a neighbouring farmer, and he was at last drawn from his obscurity by a cordelier who had lost his way, and who, pleased with the shrewdness of his remarks, took him with him, and placed him in a mean office in the school of his order. His improvement was here rapid, and he soon embraced the order, became a priest, a doctor, and professor of theology at Sienna, where he took the name of Montalto. Distinguished as a preacher at Rome, Genoa, and other places, he was sent as commissary-general to Bologna, and as inquisitor to Venice; but in this last city he behaved with such severity that he was obliged to fly from the public odium. He afterwards went to Spain with Buoncompagno, and was raised to the rank of cardinal by Pius V. On the death of Gregory XIII. the successor of Pius, the opinions of the conclave were divided, and as father Felix was regarded as a man of weak constitution, and delicate habits, he was selected by the opposite factions as a proper person, fit for a few months to settle the dispute of the rival parties. No sooner was the tiara on his head than, to the astonishment of all, his weaknesses, hitherto feigned, disappeared; he threw aside the stick on which he leaned, and lifting himself up, he began to sing, with the loudest voice, a Te Deum, and displayed in his conduct such activity, that the people could with difficulty believe him to be the same weak, helpless, and languid Montalto. His first care was to destroy the public robbers which infested the ecclesiastical states, and every where justice was administered with impartiality and with celerity. Anxious not only to embellish Rome, but to immortalize his memory, he caused an obelisk to be erected which Caligula had brought from Spain to Rome, and after the labor of four months, this stupendous column, above 100 feet high, was raised at the entrance of the church of St. Peter, and consecrated to the holy cross. He fixed, by a bull, the number of cardinals to 70; and introduced various salutary regulations in the government of the church. He labored much to improve the collection of the Vatican library; but his popularity was lost in the protection which he wished to afford to Clement, the vile assassin of Henry III. of France. He died 27th Aug. 1590, aged 69, universally detested for his pride and severity; and it is said that his death was hastened by poison. He promoted a new version of the bible, which appeared in three parts, and one vol. folio, 1590.

SIXTUS, a cordelier of Sienna. He was an able divine, and a great favorite with Pius V. He died at Genoa, 1569, aged 49. He wrote some theological works.

SKELTON, John, an English poet, born in Cumberland, and educated at Oxford, where, in 1489, he was invested with the laurel, a sort of poetical degree occasionally conferred on the favorite of the muses. He took orders, and became rector of Disis, in Norfolk; but was suspended by his diocesan, for writing loose and satirical poems. His attacks were directed not only against obscure individuals, but against Wolsey, from whose resentment he fled to the sanctuary of Westminster, and the protection of abbot Islip. He died 21st June, 1529, and was buried in St. Margaret's church, Westminster. He is called by some, but on doubtful authority, preceptor, and poet laureat to Henry VIII. His poems consist of satires, sonnets, &c. and also an attack on Lilly the grammarian, which was retorted in similar language. His genius, according to Warton, was suited to the low burlesque, and his poetry abounds not only with obscurity, but with coarse scurrility, and offensive obscenity.

SKELTON, Philip, an able divine, born near Lillburn, in Ireland, 1707. After an education at Trinity college, Dublin, where he took his master's degree, he became curate of Monaghan, and in 1750, obtained the living of Peltigo, in Donegal. In this place his conduct was not only exemplary, but humane in the extreme, so that in a time of scarcity, the charitable pastor even sold his library to supply his indigent parishioners with bread. So much merit did not pass unrewarded; the bishop of Clogher, in 1759, presented him to the living of Deconish, in Fermanagh, and in 1766, to that of Fintona, in Tyrone, where his pulpit eloquence was so powerful, that he is said to have gained over to the church, the dissenters of his district.

district. This worthy and pious divine died in Dublin, 1787. He published three volumes of sermons, which, for language, argumentation, and pathos, possess superior merit. — Deism Revealed, 2 vols. 8vo. an excellent performance — besides tracts and fugitive pieces, all of which have been collected in 7 vols. 8vo. An Account of his Life has been published by Burdy.

SKINNER, Stephen, an English antiquary, born at London, 1622, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, which he left without a degree, in consequence of the civil wars. He studied in various universities of Europe, and travelled over Italy, France, Germany, &c. and after taking a doctor's degree in medicine at Heidelberg, he returned to England, and was incorporated to the same academical honors at Oxford, 1654. He settled at Lincoln, where he practised with great success, and died of a malignant fever, 1667. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and was, as Wood says, a walking library. He wrote, Prolegomena Etymologica — Etymologicon Linguae Anglicanae — Etymologicon Botanicum — Etymologicon Onomaton, &c.

SLEIDAN, John, a German historian, born at Sleiden, on the confines of Juliers, 1506. He studied at home, and afterwards at Paris and Orleans, and in 1535, was recommended by his friend and school-fellow Sturmius, to cardinal du Bellay, who settled a pension on him, and treated him with great attention. He was afterwards engaged in negotiations in France and England, and assisted at the council of Trent. He died at Strasburg, where he had settled, and it is said, of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of his wife, 1556. He was an able and learned writer, and strongly attached to the doctrines of Luther. The best known of his compositions are, "De Statu Religionis & Reipublicae Commentarii, Carolo Quinto Caesare," in 25 books, 1555, a well written book, translated into various languages — De Quatuor Summis Imperiis Libri tres, a useful work, from which Voltaire drew much information — Froissart's, and Ph. de Comines' histories translated into Latin.

SLINGELAND, John Peter Van, a Dutch artist, born at Leyden, 1640. He was the pupil of Gerard Douw, whom he successfully imitated. He worked slowly, and was engaged three years in a family picture. He died 1691.

SLOANE, sir Hans, a celebrated physician and naturalist, born at Killileagh, in the north of Ireland, 1660. From his infancy he had a strong propensity for natural history, and to improve himself he came to London, where, in the acquaintance of Ray and of Boyle, and in the attendance of public lectures on anatomy, botany, and chemistry, he enlarged his faculties, and laid the foundation of future eminence. After four years' residence in London he went to Paris, to attend the hospitals, and the lectures of Tournefort and du Verney, and then extended his inquiries to the south of France, where the acquaintance of Chirac, and of Magnol enabled him to collect curious plants, and other natural productions. In 1684 he returned to England, and soon after was particularly noticed by Sydenham, who not only took him into his house, but recommended him to practice. He was about this time elected into the Royal society, and the college of physicians, and soon after he accompanied, as physician, the duke of Albemarle, who went out as governor of Jamaica. Though only 15 months in the island, he made such a large collection of plants, not less than 800, as astonished his friend Ray. On his return he was made physician to Christ's hospital, and in 1693, chosen secretary to the Royal society, whose transactions he superintended and enriched by some original communications. His reputation was now so great as a diligent and judicious collector of natural curiosities, that at the accession of George I. he was created a baronet, and made member of the Paris Royal academy, president of the college of physicians, and successor to the immortal Newton, as president of the Royal society. At the age of 80 this venerable character retired from public life to Chelsea, but still accessible to the poor, and still respectfully visited by the learned and the great. He died after a short illness of three days, 11th Jan. 1752, in his 91st year. The first volume of his History of Jamaica appeared 1707, and the second not till 1725. Sir Hans was an active patron of all the benevolent institutions of the metropolis, and he warmly promoted the establishment of a dispensary for the poor. He left several charitable legacies, and his cabinet of curiosities was bequeathed to the public for 20,000l. not half its original cost, and now adorns the British Museum.

SLODZ, René Michael, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris. He studied sculpture under his father, who was a native of Antwerp, and at the age of 21 he went to Rome, to perfect himself. On his return to Paris he became member of the French academy, and sculptor to the king, and declined the honorable invitations made to him by the king of Prussia. He died at Paris, 12th Oct. 1764, aged 59. The most admired of his works are, St. Bruno refusing the Mitre at Rome — the Tomb of Marquis Capponi — Heads of Calchas and Iphigenia — the tomb of cardinal d'Auvergne — and that of Languet, the minister of St. Sulpicius.

SLUYS, James Vander, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden, 1660, and bred up in the Orphans' hospital. He studied under Slingeland, and excelled in representing conversations, parties, &c. His coloring is better than his design. He died 1736.

SMALBROKE, Richard, fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, was raised, in 1723, to the see of St. David's, and in 1730, translated to Lichfield and Coventry. He wrote a Vindication of our Saviour's Miracles, against Woolston, 8vo. a performance of great merit, and died 1749.

SMALCIUS, Valentine, a famous Socinian, born in Thuringia. He was author of a treatise, in which he denied the divinity of Christ, a work which claimed much of the public attention, and which was ably refuted by Cloppenburg, and others. He died at Cracow, 14th Dec. 1622.

SMALRIDGE, George, an English prelate, born of a good family at Lichfield, 1666, and educated at Westminster school. In 1682 he was elected to Christ-church, and began soon to display his learning and his application, by his publication of Animadversions on a Piece of Obadiah Walker, on Church Government, 1687, and 1689 appeared his Latin poem called "Auctio Daviana," &c. on the sale of the books of Davis, the Oxford bookseller. When in orders he obtained respectable preferment, and in 1693, was made prebendary of Lichfield, and afterwards canon of Christ-church, then dean of Carlisle, and in 1713, dean of Christ-church, and the next year bishop of Bristol. He died Sept. 27th, 1719, and was buried at Christ-church. He published besides, 12 sermons in one volume, and after his death, 60 more were published by his widow.

SMART, Christopher, an eminent poet, born 11th April, 1722, at Shipbourne, Kent, and descended from a respectable Durham family. He received a good education at Maidstone and Durham schools, and at 17 entered at Pembroke hall, Cambridge; but his circumstances here were very unfavorable, in consequence of the death of his father, whose affairs, though steward to the Darlington family, were greatly embarrassed. His spirits were not, however, weighed down by family misfortunes, and while he was the friend and the companion of the gay, he cultivated the muses, and was thanked for his elegant translation of St. Cecilia's ode, by Pope, who recommended his undertaking a similar translation of the Essay on Criticism. This work was finished with applause, but brought no profit, and also a comedy, "A Trip to Cambridge," now deservedly forgotten. Afterwards for four successive years he obtained the Seatonian prize. In 1753 he married Miss Carnan, whose mother had taken for her second husband, Newbery, the bookseller; but in this new situation, and transplanted to a London residence, the same want of prudence and economy marked all his conduct. Though the friend of the learned, of Johnson, of Garrick, of Hawkeworth, &c. his circumstances became more narrow, and totally depended upon the exertions of his pen. His distresses at last were such that they produced occasional derangement in a mind which was naturally ardent, and could ill resist the frowns of fortune and of the world, and finally ended in melancholy insanity. A disorder in his liver put an end to his sufferings, 12th May, 1771. He left a widow and two daughters, settled as booksellers at Reading. His works consist of fables, sonnets, odes, prize poems, &c. and have been neatly printed at Reading, 2 vols. 12mo. 1791. He published besides, Horace, translated into English prose — a New Version of the Psalms — Phædrus, translated into verse — Parables, in verse — Old Woman's Magazine, &c. As a poet he possessed originality, animation, and occasional sublimity, and as a man, though too often intemperate, yet he had such a sense of devotion, that, in his sacred poems, he wrote several of the passages on his knees.

SMEATON, John, an eminent mechanic and engineer, born 28th May, 1724, at Aulthorpe, near Leeds. He early displayed a strong inclination for mechanical pursuits, though his father, an attorney, wished to bring him up to his own business. The law, however, had no charms for him, and his father wisely indulged his inclinations, and permitted him to follow the bent of his genius. In 1750 he commenced mathematical instrument maker in Turnstile, Holborn, and gained so much applause by his machine to measure a ship's way at sea, and by his compass, that in 1753, he was elected fellow of the royal society. In 1759 he received the gold medal, for his curious paper on the experimental inquiries concerning the power of wind and water to turn mills, &c. When the Edystone lighthouse was destroyed, in 1752, Smeaton was recommended by lord Macclesfield, as the fittest person to repair the damage, and of this great and astonishing work, completed in 1759, he published a very interesting account in 1791, in a folio volume. In 1764 he was elected one of the receivers of the Derwentwater estate, which he highly improved, and afterwards rose to great eminence in his profession. His abilities were employed in the execution of the great canal of Scotland, in better supplying Greenwich and Deptford with water, in improving and repairing Ramsgate harbour, and in other public works. Besides these meritorious efforts of labor and genius, he made improvements in the air pump, in mills, in the pyrometer, the hydro-meter, the steam engine, &c. On the 16th Sept. 1792, he was attacked by a paralytic stroke, at Aulthorpe, of which he died 28th October following. His character has been drawn by his friend Holmes, and he is represented not only as a most ingenious man, but as a very benevolent and amiable character in private and domestic life. His Edystone narrative has passed through a second edition. His papers were purchased by sir Joseph Banks, and are to appear before the public.

SMELLIE, William, a surgeon and physician of great eminence. He was born in Scotland, and practised in his native country, and afterwards came to London. As a teacher he was highly respectable, and had nearly a thousand pupils, who assisted him during his lectures, in the delivery of 1150 poor women. He paid great attention to his profession of midwifery, and he was the first writer who considered the shape and the size of the female pelvis as adapted to the head of the foetus, and his observations from practice and experience were most important. He had, in the height of his celebrity, several able opponents; but the skill and judgment which he displayed, the numerous improvements which he introduced in the theory and practice of midwifery, and the forceps, and other surgical instruments which he used and recommended, are proofs of a great mind happily exerted in facilitating the delivery of the female sex, and in removing erroneous customs and dangerous systems. This eminent practitioner retired, after a long and successful practice, and died some time after, at an advanced age, at Lanerk, in Scotland, 1763. He published his lectures, 8vo. 1752 — a volume of cases, 1754 — Anatomical Tables, with 36 plates, folio — and five years after his death a second volume of his cases appeared, making together a most valuable collection, and a complete system of midwifery. A printer of the same name at Edinburgh, also secretary to the Edinburgh antiquarian society, published the Philosophy of Natural History, 4to. and a translation of Buffon's voluminous works. He died in 1795.

SMITH, Mr Thomas, a learned writer, born at Walden, Essex, 1512. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1531, and and in 1536 he was made university orator. In 1539 he travelled through France and Italy, and took the degree of doctor of civil law at Padua, and on his return received the same academical honors at Cambridge. He was afterwards professor of civil law in the university, and on the accession of Edward VI. was admitted into the family of Somerset, the protector, by whose interest he was raised to the office of steward of the stanneries, provost of Eton, and dean of Carlisle. In 1548 he was made secretary of state, and knighted, and then sent as ambassador to Flanders. The disgrace of his patron removed him from the court; but his abilities were again called into action, and in 1551 he was sent ambassador to France. In Mary's reign he was again dismissed from favor, though not treated with harshness, and under Elizabeth he was restored to confidence and employment. He went to France, 1562, as ambassador, and was engaged in affairs of state till his death, 1597. As a man of learning, and a zealous protestant, he was as respectable as he was a politician. While at Cambridge, and public Greek lecturer in his college, he united with his friend John Cheke to introduce a new method of pronouncing the language; but though espoused by the best scholars of the university, by Ponet, Roger Ascham, and others, it met with opposition, and was publicly censured by the chancellor, bishop Gardiner. Smith expostulated with boldness, yet with moderation, and his epistle on the occasion was printed at Paris, when he was ambassador there, by Robert Stephens, 1568, 4to. with another, on the pronunciation of the English tongue.

SMITH, Miles, a native of Hereford, educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, from which he removed to Brazen-nose. He obtained the canon residentiaryship of his native city, and in 1612, was made bishop of Gloucester. He died 1624. He was a man of great and profound learning, well skilled in oriental languages, and he also assisted in the translation of the Bible, and wrote the preface to it. His sermons appeared in one vol. fol. 1630.

SMITH, John, an able divine born at Achurch, near Oundle, 1618. He entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge 1636, and in 1644 was chosen fellow of Queen's. He died Aug. 7, 1652, and was interred in the chapel of his college. He was a man of great learning, and endowed with the most amiable virtues. He wrote ten select discourses on theological subjects, collected together 1660 in a 4to. volume.

SMITH, Thomas, D. D. a learned writer, born in London, 1638, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. In 1663 he was appointed master of Magdalen college school, and three years after elected fellow of that college. In 1668 he went as chaplain to the embassy to Constantinople, and returned 1671. He afterwards travelled in France, and was promised a Windfor canonry for collating the Alexandrian manuscripts in St. James's library, but this he did not execute. His learning and abilities were so universally acknowledged, that he was selected to travel into the east, and to visit mount Athos to make a collection of valuable manuscripts, but he declined the offer, and continued at home. He was disappointed in his expectation of preferment from sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of state, and in 1688 he was deprived of his fellowship, by Giffard the catholic president of Magdalen, but though restored to it, he was finally deprived of it, for refusing the oaths to William and Mary. He died in London 16th May 1710. He published "Remarks on the Manners, Religion, &c. of the Turks," originally written in Latin, in four letters—de Græcæ Ecclesiæ Hodierno Statu Epistola—a Latin Life of Camden—three papers in the Philosophical Transactions—Vitæ Quorundam Eruditissimorum, & Illustrum Virorum, 1707, 4to. including Usher, Cosins, Greaves, Patrick, Young, Dee, Bainbridge, &c.—sermons—Diatriba de Chaldaicis Paraphrasis, 8vo.—Syntagma de Druidum Moribus & Institutis, 8vo. &c.

SMITH, John, an English divine, born at Lowther, Westmoreland, 1659. After being educated partly under his father, the rector of the parish, he was intended for a Scotch university, but at last was sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, 1674, where he took his degree of D. D. 1696. He was chaplain to lord Lansdown, and was afterwards patronized by Crew, bishop of Durham, who presented him to a prebend, and the living of Bishop's Wearmouth. He died 1715, at Cambridge, where he was laboriously engaged in preparing for the press an edition of the works of the venerable Bede, which at last appeared in 1722 under the care of his son George. He had also begun to write the Antiquities of Durham.

SMITH, Edmund, son of Mr. Neale, a merchant, was brought up under the care of Mr. Smith, who had married his father's sister, and, in gratitude for his affectionate treatment, he assumed his name. He was born 1668, and educated at Westminster under Busby, from whence he removed to Christ-church. Here he distinguished himself for his taste, and for his extensive knowledge of classical literature, and in 1707 his tragedy of Phædra and Hippolitus was acted at the theatre royal, recommended by a prologue from the pen of Addison, and an epilogue from the pen of Prior. This play possessed little merit, though for a while supported by the partiality of friends. He prepared besides a plan for a tragedy of lady Jane Grey, and wrote a translation of Longinus, with notes and observations, &c. In his conduct Smith was very irregular and intemperate, and though admired for his wit and his learning, he was yet offensive to the directors of his college, by the impropriety of his conduct, so that at last he was expelled from the society 1700. He was so negligent in his dress, that he was generally called captain Rag, and he was so careless of his interests that after dedicating his tragedy to lord Halifax, he, either through pride, or indolence, neglected to present it to his patron who had provided for him the grant of a place of 300l. a year. He died 1710.

SMITH, John, a most excellent mezzotinter, according to Horace Walpole, flourished at the end of William's reign. He studied under Vander Vaart, and worked in the house of sir Godfrey Kneller, whose pieces he published with great success. His chief works are night pieces after Schalken.

SMITH, George, an eminent landscape painter, born at Chichester 1714. His abilities gained some prizes at the society of arts. He died 7th Sept. 1776, and was buried in St. Pancras church-yard, Chichester. He had two brothers William and John, equally distinguished as painters. William the eldest excelled as a portrait painter, and in his fruit pieces, and died 27th Sept. 1764, and John, whose landscapes were much admired, died 29th July, the same year.

SMITH, William, an able scholar and divine, born at Worcester, 1711. He was educated at Winchester and New college, and became rector of Trinity church, Chester. He was for one year at the head of Brentwood school, Essex, but resigned in 1749, and in 1758 was promoted to the deanery of Chester, to which was added, in 1766, the rectory of Handley. His life was spent in the laborious service of literature, and of the church, and he published an elegant and valuable translation of Thucydides, and of Longinus, besides a volume of sermons on the Beatitudes. He died 1787.

SMITH, Adam LL. D. a celebrated writer, born 5th June, 1723, at Kirkaldy, where his father who died a few months before his birth was comptroller of the customs. Though of a weak constitution he had from his earliest years great partiality for books. At the age of three he was stolen by some vagrants and with difficulty recovered. After receiving instruction at Kirkaldy he was sent to Glasgow university; but as his friends destined him for the church of England he removed in 1740, to Baliol college, Oxford, as an exhibitioner. Not wishing, however, to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, he left Oxford after seven years' residence and returned to Scotland, and in 1751, he was elected professor of logic in the university of Glasgow, and the next year succeeded Cragie in the chair of moral philosophy. In 1759 he published his Theory of Moral Sentiments, and in 1763 he quitted his professorship to accompany the duke of Buccleugh in his travels on the continent. He visited, with his pupil, Toulouse, Geneva, and the south of France, and on his return to Paris became acquainted with the wits and the learned men of the capital. His travels were continued for three years, after which he retired to the domestic seclusion of Kirkaldy with his mother for 10 years. Hume and his other friends in vain expostulated against his retirement, but in 1771 he convinced them that his mind had been actively employed, by the publication of his celebrated work, an Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, 2 vols. 4to. This excellent book often republished in 3 vols. 8vo. procured him the appointment of commissioner of the customs in Scotland, and after being some time in London, he, in 1778, retired to Edinburgh where he enjoyed the rest of life in honorable independence, in the society of the learned, and among the companions of his earliest years. He now occasionally devoted himself to study, but not with that zeal which might have enabled him to add fresh celebrity to his fame; and when at last infirmities came upon him, he found it was too late to think of completing the works on which, in his serious hours, he had meditated. He died July 1790, of a chronic obstruction in his bowels, and after his death some essays and other miscellanies, which he had not ordered to be destroyed, were published by his executors in 4to. 1795. Of the powers of his mind, and of his comprehensive information, his works will be a lasting memorial to the latest posterity. With all the perfections of a well cultivated understanding, he did not, however, possess that knowledge of the world which might have adorned a more active life, and though admired for his talents, he was careless in the midst of business, and absent to an extraordinary degree. It is to be lamented that his great qualities were disgraced by notions of infidelity. When he published the "Life of David Hume, written by himself," he added remarks which conveyed to the world how determined a foe he was to christianity, and though he was attacked with efficacy, and all the powers of wit by Dr. Horne, he never renounced those principles which proved him a deist, and the friend of the infidel philosophers of France.

SMITH, Charlotte, a well known writer. She was daughter of Mr. Turner, a man of property in Surry and Suffex, and when very young she married Mr. Smith, whose father was possessed of some valuable estates in the West Indies. The affairs of her husband, however, proved not so prosperous as was expected, and after various persecutions from creditors and from lawyers, and after passing some time in the gloom of a prison, with her unfortunate consort, she retired with her family to a chateau in Normandy. But here again persecution attended her, the chicanery of the lawyers, and the ingratitude of her friends reduced her to the greatest indigence, yet, however, though oppressed by domestic sorrows, the exertions of her mind administered to her wants. She wrote several novels which gained her a comfortable subsistence, and the romance of Real Life, Emmeline, Ethelinda, Celestina, Desmond, the Old Manor House, poems, sonnets, &c. contributed liberally to procure her the public esteem, and a respectable income. This ingenious, but unfortunate woman, died at Thetford, near Farnham, Surry, 28th Oct. 1806. Her novels display great powers of invention, and it is remarkable that in all of them she has interwoven much of her own personal misfortunes, and painted every where in strong colors, the character of those rapacious lawyers, to whose dishonesty she ascribed all her sorrows. Her descriptions are interesting, and her style is elegant; so that she aspired to the reputation not of a temporary novel writer, but hoped that her compositions would become the ornament of every elegant library. Her sonnets possess peculiar beauty, and all her writings every where display the powers of a fine imagination, correct taste, and strong judgment.

SMITZ, Lewis, an eminent painter, born at Dort. His fruit pieces were highly valued, but though beautiful, the colors proved not of long duration. He died 1675, aged 49.

SMITZS, Gasper, a Dutch painter. He was very happy in his portraits, and his Magdalens were peculiarly admired. He died at Dublin 1689.

SMOLLETT, Tobias, M. D. a Scotch physician more celebrated as an author. He was born near Cameron on the banks of the Leven, 1720. He was brought up for the medical line, and served as a surgeon in the fleet which bombarded Carthage; but as his professional talents did not meet with encouragement, he commenced author. After trying his fortune in plays and poems, he published in 1748 his Roderick Random, 2 vols. 12mo. which excited much of the public attention, and ensured success to his future publications. Peregrine Pickle appeared in 1751, 4 vols. 12mo. and became very popular, not only on account of its own intrinsic merit, but for the adventures of a lady of quality, lady Vane, and for the entertainment of a republican doctor, supposed to be Akenfide, portrayed with all the humor and skill of a most facetious and learned scholar. Ferdinand, count Fathom, appeared in 1754, and the next year the Critical Review was undertaken, and conducted by him till 1763. In this work he exposed himself to much obloquy, and his censure of admiral Knowles' pamphlet on the Rochefort Expedition, brought on a prosecution against him. He was in consequence fined 100*l.* and imprisoned in the King's Bench three months, during which confinement he wrote his fir Lancelot Greaves, 2 vols. 12mo. In 1762 he enlisted among the periodical writers in defence of lord Bute's administration, and published the Briton, which was immediately followed by the North Briton. In 1763 he went abroad for the benefit of his health, and returned after two years' absence, and published an Account of his Travels, 2 vols. 8vo. a work which Sterne, in his Sentimental Journey, ridicules under the name of Smelfungus. His Humphrey Clinker appeared in 1771, and soon after, in consequence of the ill state of his health, and other disagreeable circumstances, he left England for Italy. He died in Italy, 21st Oct. 1771, and an epitaph on his monument by his friend Dr. Armstrong, marks the spot of his interment near Leghorn. Besides those works already mentioned, Dr. Smollett published, 1757, an History of England, 4 vols. 4to. edited also in 8vo. a work which produced him great profit, though regarded as partial, inaccurate, and hastily written — a translation of Gil Blas and Don Quixote into English — a Collection of Voyages and Travels — the Regicide — poems, &c. His life has been written by Dr. Anderson, 1796, and since by Dr. Moore. In his character Smollett was a man of acknowledged virtue and probity, and his abilities rank him high in the list of authors of celebrity. His two best works are Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle, and in these he introduces great diversity of characters, interesting descriptions, and pleasing variety, though it is to be lamented that some parts of his narrative are more licentious than virtue can approve. His other novels are inferior performances, though they are not devoid of interesting anecdotes. The persecution and poverty to which he was occasionally exposed, ruffled the disposition of this able writer; and when the conduct of lord Bute, and the unfulfilled promises of other patrons, are well considered, it will be easy to explain why an author speaks with harshness and envenomed acrimony against the ingratitude of false friends, the tyranny of the great, and the insolence of rank. The mortifications and disappointments to which he was exposed by the spirit of faction, and the persecution of enemies, were increased by the loss of his daughter, an only child; and he must be added to the number of those who, after contributing to the amusement, the improvement, and the intellectual pleasures of others, find vexation, disquiet, and neglect, the reward for mental exertions.

SMYTH, James, Vid. Moore.

SNELL, Rodolphus, a native of Oudewater in Holland, professor of Hebrew and mathematics at Leyden, where he died 1613, aged 67. He is author of some mathematical and philosophical works, now little known. His son Willebrord, was born at Leyden, 1591, and succeeded his father in the chair of mathematics, 1613. He is the first who discovered the true laws of the refraction of light, and he undertook to measure the earth in the same method, which afterwards was adopted by Picard and Cassini. His best works are, Eratosthenes Batavus — and Cyclometrium, 4to. He died at Leyden, 1626, aged 35.

SNORRO, Sturlesonius, a native of Iceland, whose abilities were employed in political affairs, as the minister of state to one king of Sweden, and to three kings of Norway. He retired, in an insurrection, to Iceland, where he was governor, and was at last pursued and put to death by his enemy Gyffurus, 1241. He wrote Chronicon Regum Norwegorum — Edda Islandica, two useful works, the last of which was translated by Mallet.

SNOY, Renier, a native of Ter-gouw in Holland, who studied medicine, and was also engaged in a diplomatic capacity by Charles V. to the courts of Christiern II. of Denmark, and James IV. of Scotland. He died in his native town, 1st Aug. 1537, aged 60. He wrote the History of Holland, in 13 books, in Latin, folio, 1620. — Another of that name, Lambert, was a native of Malines, who devoted himself laboriously to the genealogical history of the Low Countries, and died 1638, aged 64.

SNYDERS, Francis, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, 1587, and bred under Van Balen. He visited Italy, and settled at Brussels, and was attached to the household of the Spanish court. His hunting pieces, animals, fish, kitchens, &c. were much admired. In some of his pieces he was assisted by Rubens. He died 1657. He also engraved a book of animals of 16 leaves.

SOANEN, John, an eminent French ecclesiastic, born at Rioms, 6th Jan. 1647. After teaching divinity in the provinces, he acquired celebrity as a preacher at Lyons, Orleans, and Paris, and was one of the four distinguished orators who, at that time, were called the four evangelists. He was raised to the see of Senes; but his opposition to the bull Unigenitus was condemned by the council of Embrun, and he was stripped of his episcopal honors, and died an exile at Chaife-Dieu, Auvergne, 25th Dec. 1740. He wrote Pastoral Instructions — Mandemens — letters — sermons, &c.

SOBIESKI, John III. a celebrated warrior, who by merit rose to the throne. His father was James Sobieski governor of Poland. He received his education at Paris, and rose gradually by valor to the highest ranks in the army, and in 1665, was made grand marshal and general of the Polish armies, and afterwards palatine of Cracovia. After retaking several cities from the Cossacks in the Ukraine, he at last gained the famous battle of Choczyn on the Niester in 1673, in which the Turks lost 28,000 men. This victory, and a character eminent for every virtue, raised him to the throne on the death of Michael, and in 1683, he marched to the relief of Vienna, closely besieged by the Turks. So great was the terror of his name that the Turks fled with precipitation at his approach and even left behind the great standard of Mahomet, which the conqueror sent to the pope with these words, in imitation of Cæsar, "I came, I saw, God hath conquered." This truly great and heroic monarch died at Warsaw, 17th June, 1696, universally regretted, not only by the soldiers, by whom he was beloved, but by men of letters, whom he liberally and judiciously patronized. He was acquainted with most of the languages of Europe. His Life has been written by abbé Coyer, 3 vols. 12mo.

SOCINUS, Lælius, the founder of the Socinian sect, was born at Sienna in 1525, and designed for the civil law by his father, who was himself an able civilian at Bologna. To the study of civil law he united that of divinity, and therefore acquired a knowledge of Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic; but when, by deep investigation, he discovered the fallacy of the Romish church, he sought a safer asylum out of Italy, and after travelling through Germany, France, England, the Netherlands, and Poland, he at last settled at Zurich. In this retreat he became the friend and associate of the celebrated reformers, of Calvin, Bellen-ger, Beza, Melancthon, and others; but a difference of opinion with respect to the Trinity, soon produced hostile treatment. Calvin reproved sharply the strange opinions of his late friend, and Socinus, in the midst of theological animosity, had the good sense to keep his sentiments, and further to dread the resentment of his opponents when he saw Servetus soon after dragged to the stake. He afterwards travelled into Poland, and disseminated his opinions where he could be secure and unmolested, and after visiting Venice, he returned to Zurich, where he died 1562, aged 37. His tenets, though not very widely disseminated by him, were afterwards more fully spread by his nephew.

SOCINUS, Faustus, nephew to the above, was born at Sienna, 1539, and educated under the care of his uncle, who expected from his rising abilities a firm and active supporter of his theological opinions. He was at Lyons when Lælius died, and though only 20 years old, he immediately repaired to Zurich, to obtain possession of his papers, which, however, he for some time disregarded, while for 12 years enjoying the favors and the patronage of the court of Florence. In 1574 he left the palace of the Medici, and came to Germany, and after studying divinity at Basil, he, in 1579, went to Poland, where he began to disseminate his uncle's doctrines with a few alterations of his own. He was violently opposed by some of the Unitarians, but found an asylum near Cracow, in the house of a Polish lord, whose daughter he married. In 1598 he was exposed to fresh insults from the students and the populace of Cracow, and he escaped with difficulty from their fury. He spent the remainder of his days about nine miles from Cracow, in the house of a Polish gentleman, and died there 1604, aged 65. His sect survived their leader, and still must exist, while opinions contrary to scripture and reason are countenanced, and while religious disputants endeavor to outdo each other in virulence and animosity, and not in the mild virtues and pure benevolence which the gospel of Christ teaches. The Socinians maintain that Jesus did not exist before he was born of the Virgin Mary, that he was a mere man, that the Holy Ghost is no distinct person, and that the father alone is properly God. They explain away the doctrine of redemption, and the satisfaction made by the sacrifice of Christ, and therefore deny the existence of original sin, of grace, and of predestination. They affirm that the soul sleeps in death with the body, and that both will again rise together, either to the enjoyment of felicity, or the sufferings of punishment; but that whilst future felicity is eternal, the punishments of hell fire are proportioned only in duration to the demerits and offences of the sinner.

SOCRATES, an illustrious philosopher of Athens. He followed the profession of his father, a sculptor, for some time, till philosophy more fully engaged his attention. After distinguishing himself in the field of battle in the defence of his country, he commenced public instructor of youth, and soon saw his lectures followed by large, respectable, and admiring audiences. The simplicity of his dress, and the innocence and virtues of his life, however, in the midst of a restless and jealous population, soon procured him enemies; and while he directed all the energies of his mind to reform the morals of Athens, he was accused of corrupting the young Athenians, and of making innovations in the religion of his country. Against perjured witnesses, and before prejudiced judges, integrity is of no avail, and Socrates, therefore, was condemned to death. Though he could escape, he bowed before the unjust sentence, and drinking the fatal poison, expired in a few moments, B. C. 400. The Athenians too late repented of their cruelty; but while they punished his murderers with death, the virtues and character of their immortal sage were delineated in the writings of two of his faithful pupils, Xenophon and Plato.

SOCRATES, the scholastic, a native of Constantinople, author of a valuable, though occasionally inaccurate, Ecclesiastical History to the year 400 from the period where Eusebius ends.

SOLANDER, Daniel Charles, a celebrated naturalist, the pupil of Linnæus. He was born in the province of Nordland in Sweden, 28th Feb. 1736, and studied at Upsal, where he took the degree of M. D. In 1760, he visited England, and by the recommendation of his friend Collinson, he was employed to form a catalogue of the natural curiosities preserved in the British museum, and in 1765, was appointed one of the assistants in that valuable establishment. In 1768, he was prevailed upon by his friend Mr., afterwards Sir Joseph, Banks, to accompany him in Cook's voyage round the world, and without losing his appointment at the museum. By his judicious and indefatigable inquiries inquiries during this voyage, a great addition was made to the plants and natural curiosities then known to Europeans. In 1773, he was advanced to the place of under librarian in the museum, and he died of an apoplexy 16th May, 1782. He is author of a description of the collection of petrifications found in Hampshire, and presented to the British museum, by Mr. Brander, and also of observations on natural history in Cook's voyage, and a letter in the philosophical transactions, &c. He has been celebrated by Dr. Pultney and by others, not only as a man of great abilities as a philosopher and naturalist, but as of modest and unassuming manners, and his visit to this country may be regarded as an important era in the history of botany.

SOLÉ, Anthony, a painter, born at Bologna. His landscapes are particularly beautiful. He died at Bologna 1677, aged 80. His son Joseph, was also an eminent artist in history and in landscape painting, and died 1719, aged 65.

SOLIGNAC, Peter Joseph de la Pimpie, chevalier of, the secretary and friend of Stanislaus, king of Poland, and author of a Polish History, in 5 vols. 12mo. was born at Montpellier, and died 1773, aged 86. He wrote besides, an Eloge on Stanislaus — a Piece on Education — the Amours of Horace — Pieces on the Memoirs of the Academy of Nanci, &c.

SOLIMENE, Francis, an Italian painter, born at Nocera de Pagani near Naples, 1657. He was permitted to study under his father who was himself a painter, at the persuasion of cardinal Orsini, afterwards Benedict XIII. and by consulting the works of the greatest masters he acquired a correct and elegant style. He settled at Naples where he was universally courted, and the most liberal offers were made to him by the kings of France and Spain, which he declined. He was also received with great distinction by the pope and cardinals at Rome, and by Philip V. and he was knighted by the emperor Charles VI. After living in becoming splendor and deservedly respected, he died at Naples 1747, aged almost 90. His pieces are much admired, and he was equally eminent as a man of letters and a poet.

SOLINUS, Caius Julius, a Roman grammarian, who flourished in the midst of the third century. His Polyhistor is a compilation of historical and geographical remarks, and he is called Pliny's ape, as the close imitator of that great naturalist.

SOLIS, Antonio de, a Spanish writer, born at Placenza in Old Castile, 1610. He studied law at Salamanca, but devoted himself more fondly to literary pursuits. At the age of 17 he wrote a comedy well received, and by his abilities obtained the patronage of the viceroy of Navarre, and then of the king of Spain, to whom he was made secretary. He was afterwards appointed historiographer of the Indies, and in this office, which was as honorable as it was lucrative, he published his History of the Conquest of Mexico, admired as a valuable composition, which he concludes with the subjugation of the Mexicans, that he may not have to record the consequent cruelties of his countrymen. In the latter part of his life he devoted himself more seriously to religious duties, and took orders at the age of 57. He died 1686. He wrote besides some poems and dramatic pieces. His history has been translated into various languages, and into English by Townshend.

SOLOMON, son of David and Bathsheba, was king of Israel after his father. He is celebrated for his wisdom, the fame of which was so widely spread that distant princes came to see and to admire him, and he is equally distinguished for his piety, and for the magnificent temple which he erected at Jerusalem, in honor of the God of Israel, and which he consecrated with the most solemn pomp. The latter part of his life was unhappily disgraced by intemperance and debauchery, and in marrying the daughter of the king of Egypt; and in keeping a great number of concubines, he tarnished that high character of sanctity, and of uprightness, which had rendered his reign so glorious. He died 975 B. C. aged 58. He wrote the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles, to which some add the book of Wisdom in the apocrypha, though most probably the composition of a more modern pen.

SOLOMON BEN VIRGA, a Spanish physician, and rabbi of the 16th century, author of an History of the Jews, from the destruction of the temple to his own times, of which a Latin translation appeared 1651, at Amsterdam, 4to.

SOLOMON, Ben Job Jalla, an African, born at Bondarenear the river Senegal. He was sent by his father, who was a prince of the country, to sell slaves to captain Pyke, an English trader, and not agreeing in price set out across the Gambia, where he was taken prisoner by another race of blacks, enemies to his country, and sold himself as a slave. He was carried to Annapolis in America, and afterwards escaped, and upon making himself known was ransomed by general Oglethorpe and others, and came to England, 1733. He was in London employed by sir Hans Sloane in translating some Arabic MSS. and during his residence of 14 months he was much noticed, and after being introduced at court returned to his country loaded with kindness and presents. He had a very retentive memory, and could repeat the Koran by heart at 15, and he actually wrote the whole book in England three times by recollection only. Memoirs of him were published by Mr. Bluet, and he is also mentioned in Moore's travels, and Astley's voyages.

SOLON, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was called upon by his countrymen in the midst of their turbulent and distracted state to introduce regularity and order into their government, and he established among them his famous laws, which they solemnly bound themselves by an oath to observe. He died in Cyprus 558 B. C. aged 80.

SOLYMAN I. saved himself from the fatal battle of Ancyra, and was proclaimed emperor of the Turks after his father Bajazet 1402. He displayed great valor as a warrior, but his glory was tarnished by his excessive love of pleasure, which at last hastened his end. He was dethroned in consequence of his effeminacy by his brother Musa, 1410, and assassinated.

SOLYMAN II. surnamed the Magnificent, succeeded to his father Selim I. 1520. His reign was useful and splendid, he defeated the rebellious Mamelukes in Egypt, and made peace with Ismael Sophi, after which he carried his arms against Europe, and took Belgrade. In 1522, he attacked Rhodes, which was held by the knights of Jerusalem, and after a vigorous defence he took it, and then invaded Hungary and defeated the Hungarian army at the celebrated battle of Mohatz, 1526. The conquest of Buda was followed by the siege of Vienna, but after 20 unsuccessful assaults, Solyman retreated from the place, with the loss of 80,000 men. In 1534, he made war against Tauris and Persia, but suffered a defeat, and was disappointed in his attack on Malta, though in 1566, he took from the Genoese the island of Chios. This brave emperor died 30th Aug. 1566, aged 76, at the siege of Sigeth in Hungary, four days before its surrender.

SOLYMAN III. emperor of Turkey, 1687, after the deposition of Mahomet IV. He was a very indolent and superstitious prince, whose affairs were administered by his favorite Mustapha Coprogli. He died 22d June, 1691.

SOMBREUIL, Francis Charles Virot de, a French general, whose attachment to the cause of Lewis XVI. during the revolution produced his ruin. He was imprisoned in consequence of his loyalty, and on the 2d Sep. 1792, as he was going to be assassinated by the murderers of that fatal day, his daughter, young and amiable, rushed into the midst of the bloody assembly, and obtained his release. The next year, however, proved more fatal, and he was condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal, on some frivolous accusation, and was guillotined with his eldest son by his side. His second son Charles escaped from his murderers, and after distinguishing himself in the Prussian armies and in Holland against Custines, he passed to England, and in 1795, was sent to head the forces which were landed at Quiberon. This expedition was unfortunate, and he was taken prisoner by Hoche, and carried to l'Orient and Vannes, where he was condemned to be shot. In the preparations for death he obtained permission to repair for three days on board the English ships on the coast to settle his affairs, and at the appointed moment this heroic character returned to save his honor and to perish. He gave himself to the soldiers, who shot him, the order to fire, and fell lamented even by those who cruelly shed his blood.

SOMERS, John, lord, chancellor of England, son of an attorney, was born at Worcester 1652. He was educated at a private school, Staffordshire, and then entered at Trinity college, Oxford, from which he removed to the Middle Temple. He united here the study of polite literature with that of the law, and in 1681, he assisted in the publication of "a just and modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments," which Charles had dissolved with dissatisfaction. He afterwards highly distinguished himself as an able and eloquent pleader, and was, in 1683, one of the counsel for Pilkington, lord Gray, and others who had caused a riot in London, and in 1688, for the seven bishops. In the convention parliament of 1689, he was member for Worcester, and was one of the managers of the commons at a conference with the lords about the word "abdicated." He was soon after made solicitor-general and knighted, and in 1692, appointed attorney-general. In 1697, he was raised to the peerage, and made lord chancellor, but in 1700 he was removed from his high situation, and accused by the commons, of high crimes and misdemeanors, of which, upon trial before his peers, he was acquitted. He now abandoned the struggles of political life for studious retirement, and was soon after chosen president of the Royal society. He, however, occasionally labored for the prosperity of his country in the house of lords, and projected the union between Scotland and England. In 1708, he was president of the council, but was removed by the change of ministry two years after. He grew so infirm, that he held no office under George I. He died of an apoplectic fit, 26th April, 1716, after surviving for some time the powers of his mind. He was never married. He wrote various pieces, and translated Plutarch's life of Alcibiades, in the lives by several hands, and also Dido's letter to Æneas from Ovid, &c. His character is deservedly celebrated, not only as a man of learning, but as the patron of the learned; and in the midst of political corruption and court intrigue he is represented as a patient, mild, and benevolent magistrate, uncorrupted as a statesman and lawyer, as an orator eloquent, possessed of a most refined taste, and a most upright patriot. He was among those who recommended to public notice the Paradise Lost, which party-spirit and false taste seemed desirous to condemn to eternal obscurity.

SOMERVILLE, William, an English poet, born of an ancient family at Edston, Warwickshire, 1692. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, and when settled on his paternal estate he became known as a justice of the peace, as a poet, and as a country gentleman. The latter part of his life was spent in the midst of distress and poverty. He died 14th July, 1743. He wrote the Chace, a poem, much and deservedly admired, and some other pieces. He also is said to have translated Voltaire's play of Alzire.

SOMMERY, N. Fontette de, a lady, whose parentage is unknown, as she was secretly entrusted to the care of a convent by some person who withdrew immediately all connection with her. She possessed great powers of mind, with inoffensive gaiety, and she was patronized by the wife of marshal Brissac, and by her liberality rendered independent. Her company was in consequence sought by philosophers and men of learning, and her conduct and conversation deserve the respect which she received from the noble and the opulent. She died about 1792, in an advanced age, universally esteemed. Her Doutes sur les Opinions recues dans la Societé, appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1784, and she published besides l'Oreille, an Asiatic romance, 3 vols. 12mo. — letters, &c.

SOMMIER, John Claude, a French ecclesiastic of Lorraine. He published l'Histoire Dogmatique de la Religion, 6 vols. 4to. a work of merit, — and the History of the Holy See, 7 vols. 8vo. a composition which, though decried in France, procured for him from Benedict XIII. the archbishopric of Cæsarea. He died 1737, aged 76.

SOMNER, William, an eminent antiquary, born at Canterbury, 30th March, 1606. After finishing his education at Canterbury school, he became assistant to his father, who was engaged in the ecclesiastical courts of the diocese, but antiquities, and not law, were his particular study. In 1640, he published "the Antiquities of Canterbury," a very valuable performance, and by the encouragement of his friend Meric Casaubon, he devoted himself laboriously to the acquisition of the old Gaelic, Irish, Scotch, Danish, Gothic, Saxon, and other northern dialects, that he might with greater accuracy and success develop the records of ancient times. Thus celebrated, he was consulted by the most learned of the nation, and when the Anglicanæ Historiæ Scriptores decem, &c. were published he prepared the Glossary for that valuable work. He was in 1657, at the recommendation of archbishop Usher, nominated to the vacant Saxon lectureship at Cambridge, by Spelman the patron, and in consequence of this appointment he finished his Saxon dictionary, published at Oxford 1659. Before the restoration he was imprisoned for petitioning for a free parliament, but in 1660, he was made master of St. John's hospital, Canterbury. He published in 1660, in 4to. a treatise of Gavel Kind, &c. a most capital work. He died 30th March, 1669, leaving several valuable papers behind him. His library was purchased for the use of Canterbury church. He was in private life a most respectable and benevolent man, acquainted with the most learned persons of the age. He was twice married.

SOPHOCLES, an Athenian, distinguished as a warrior, and particularly as a tragic poet. He was 20 times rewarded with the poetical prize, and had for his master Æschylus, and for his rival Euripides. Only seven of his plays are extant, to prove how deservedly he was entitled, for the spirit and elegance of his language, and the sublimity of his thoughts, to the applauses of his admiring countrymen.

SOPHONISBA, daughter of Asdrubal, and wife of king Syphax, married afterwards Masinissa on the defeat and death of her first husband. The marriage was displeasing to Scipio, and Sophonisba, obliged to abandon her second lord, poisoned herself in obedience to his commands, B. C. 203.

SORANUS, an Ephesian physician, who settled at Rome, under Trajan and Adrian. Some of his works are extant. Another physician of that name wrote a treatise on the Diseases of Women.

SORBAIT, Paul, imperial physician, and professor of medicine at Vienna, was born at Hainault. He was author of Commentaries on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, 4to. — Medicina Universalis, Theoretica & Practica, fol. — Consilium Medicum, &c. and died 1691, at a great age.

SORBIERE, Samuel, a French writer, born in the diocese of Uzes, 1610 or 1615. He lost his parents in his youth, and was educated by his maternal uncle, the learned Petit, and afterwards studied divinity at Paris, which he relinquished for medicine. He visited Holland, and wished to settle at Leyden; but in 1653 he abandoned the protestant religion for the popish, and published a Vindication of his Conduct, dedicated to Mazarin. He was at Rome, and was noticed by the pope, and then visited England, and published an account of his voyage thither, though he resided only three months in the country; but his abuse and scurrility were so offensive, that not only Sprat, but Voltaire himself, is severe upon his work; and for this satirical composition he was dismissed from the office of historiographer of France, by the French government. He afterwards paid his court to Clement IX.; but he received no higher preferment, as some suspected the soundness of his faith. He was in general a fair, unblemished character, and died of a dropsy at Bonne, 9th April, 1670. He wrote various publications, about 20 in number, though none of any importance. He was a correspondent of Hobbes, and had the art of sending his letters on philosophical subjects to his friend Gassendi, and then of transmitting, as his own, his answers to the English philosopher, who, thus deluded, admired the abilities, and the profound learning of his French associate.

SORBONNE, Robert de, founder of the celebrated college of that name at Paris, was born at Sorbon, near Rheims, 1201. Though originally poor, yet he acquired celebrity as a preacher, and became chaplain to Lewis IX. and when made canon of Cambray, he laid the foundation of his college, 1253. He died 1274, and left all his property to the improvement of his college, which has produced many respectable members. He wrote some theological tracts, &c. now little read.

SOREL, Agnes, a native of Fromenteau, in Touraine. She was maid of honor to the queen of Charles VII. of France, who became enamoured of her, and at last abandoned the cares of government for her loved society. Agnes, weak only in the presence of her royal lover, influenced him to deeds of glory, and roused him to attack the English forces, which depopulated his kingdom. She maintained her influence over the heart of Charles till her death, which happened 9th Feb. 1450, in her 40th year, at Mesnel, near Jumieges. Some have reported, but falsely, that she was poisoned by order of the dauphin Lewis XI. From her beauty she was called by the poets of the age, the fairest of the fair, and in the powers of the mind, had she preserved her virtue, she might have equalled the most celebrated of her sex. She bore three daughters to Charles VII.

SORGH, Hendrick, a painter of Rotterdam, who studied under Teniers, and excelled in the representation of fairs, markets, &c. He died 1684, aged 61.

SORRI, Peter, an Italian painter. He was born at Sienna, and died 1622, aged 66.

SOSIGENES, an astronomer of Egypt, whose abilities were employed by J. Cæsar, in the reformation of the calendar. He made the Julian year consist of 365 days, B. C. 45.

SOSTRATES, an architect of Cnidos, who built the the celebrated tower of Pharos, in the bay of Alexandria. He flourished B. C. 273.

SOTADES, a Grecian poet of Maronea, in Thrace. It is said that he was thrown into the sea in a leaden chest by order of Philadelphus, of Egypt, whom he had ridiculed in a satirical poem.

SOTO, Dominic, a learned Dominican, born 1494, at Segovia, where his father was a gardener. He studied divinity at Alcalá, and at Paris, and entered among the Dominicans on his return to Spain, and was made, in consequence of his abilities, confessor to Charles V. by whom he was sent in 1545, to the council of Trent. Though distinguished for eloquence, he possessed little ambition, and refused the bishoprick of Segovia, and early resigned the place of imperial confessor. He died 1560. He wrote, a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans — treatises, De Justitiâ & Jure — De Pauperum Causâ — De cavendo Juramentorum Abusu, &c. There was another of the same name also at the council of Trent. He came to England with king Philip, with the intention of restoring the universities to the catholic faith, and died 1563. He was author of some theological tracts.

SOUBISE, John de Parthenai, lord of, of an illustrious house in Poitou, was one of the chief leaders of the protestants. He came from Ferrara, where he had enjoyed the favor of the duke, to France, and was sent by the prince of Condé, his new patron, to defend Lyons, and he behaved there with such bravery, that the duke of Nemours was obliged to raise the siege. This great man, so much loved by the Calvinists, and dreaded by the catholics, died 1566, aged 54, leaving one daughter.

SOUBISE, Benjamin de Rohan, duke of, son of Renatus de Rohan, by the only daughter of the preceding, distinguished himself on the side of the protestants, and ably defended with his brother, the town of Rochelle against the arms of France. In 1621 he long maintained the independence of St. John d'Angeli against Lewis XIII., and when he surrendered, he obtained honorable terms, and a free pardon. The next year he took Oleron, and extended his conquests over Poitou; but a reverse of fortune obliged him to fly, and he retired to England, where he died 1640.

SOUCHAI, John Baptist, a French writer, born at St. Amand, near Vendôme. He distinguished himself as a member of the academy of inscriptions, to whose memoirs he made valuable contributions, and he became canon of Rodez, counsellor to the king, and professor of eloquence in the royal college. He translated sir Thomas Browne's Vulgar Errors, 2 vols. — edited Aufonius, 4to. — and Pellison's works, 3 vols. 12mo. and died 1746, aged 59.

SOUCIET, Stephen, a jesuit, born at Bourges, 12th Oct. 1671. He taught rhetoric and divinity in his society, and afterwards was librarian to the college of Louis the Great, and died at Paris, 14th Jan. 1744. He wrote, Astronomical Observations in China and India, 3 vols. 4to. — Critical Dissertations on difficult Passages in Scripture, 4to. — Dissertations against Newton's Chronology, 4to. &c. His brother Stephen Augustin died two days after him. He was professor of theology at the college of Louis the Great, and he wrote Poems on Comets, 8vo. — Agriculture, with notes, 8vo. in Latin, in a pure and elegant style.

SOUFFLOT, James Germain, an eminent architect, born at Trenci, near Auxerre, 1713. His inclinations to study architecture were thwarted by his father; but he left home, and travelled to Italy, where he perfected his knowledge, and returned to France, to give the most convincing proofs of his abilities. He was engaged at Lyons, and afterwards at Paris became comptroller of the buildings of Marly and the Thuilleries, and superintendant of the royal buildings. His greatest work is the church of Genevieve; but it is said that the opposition raised against him, and the consequent vexations, shortened his days. He died 29th Aug. 1780, aged 67.

SOUTH, Robert, a celebrated English divine, son of a merchant, born at Hackney, Middlesex, 1633. He was educated under Busby, and in 1651, was elected to Christ-church, Oxford. Here he greatly distinguished himself by his talents both as a poet and a preacher; but it must be observed that his character, if we may credit Wood, his contemporary, was neither candid nor consistent. When Cromwell had made peace with the Dutch he congratulated him in a Latin poem, and abused the independents in the pulpit, whilst he favored the cause of the presbyterians; but when the restoration approached, he inveighed with the most eloquent zeal against presbyterians, and every denomination of dissenters. His abilities were so respectable however, notwithstanding his time-serving character, that he was in 1660, elected public orator of the university, and the next year became chaplain to lord Clarendon, and in consequence of this connection obtained a sinecure in Wales, and the degree of D. D. conferred by the university. In 1670 he was made canon of Christ-church, and in 1676, attended Hyde ambassador to Poland, and at his return published an account of that kingdom. In 1678 he was made, by the chapter of Westminster, rector of Ilip; but though some have imagined that he was eager after higher preferment, and dissatisfied, it is asserted that he lived in retirement at Caversham, near Reading, and refused not only an English bishopric, but an archbishopric in Ireland, offered him by Rochester, the lord lieutenant. At the revolution he took the oaths of allegiance, and might have again received a high ecclesiastical dignity. In 1693 he had a controversy with Sherlock about the Trinity, which was carried on with great acrimony, and though the university of Oxford declared in his favor, yet the dispute was not allayed till the king published a decree to forbid the meddling with the subject of the Trinity, except in a manner agreeable to the doctrines of the church of England. This controversy was finely ridiculed in the "Battle Royal," a popular ballad, which exposed to public derision the two disputants, and Dr. Burnet, of the Charter-house. In Anne's reign South did little, though he was a warm advocate of Sacheverell, and of his doctrines. He died 8th July, 1716, aged 83, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Though learned and eloquent, South was not an amiable character; he was morose, overbearing, and haughty, and while his zeal for religion rendered rendered him popular, his disposition, and the violence of his manners showed him to be a disagreeable man. His sermons have often appeared in 6 vols. 8vo. and possess great merit, and unite, with judgment and erudition, art and a strong vein of satirical moroseness. His Opera Posthuma, &c. appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1717.

SOUTHERN, Thomas, an English dramatist, born at Stratford on Avon, Warwickshire, 1662. He was servitor at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. and then went to settle in London. He now began to publish plays, and by this employment acquired a very comfortable subsistence. The Loyal Brother, or Perfian Prince, appeared in 1682, to compliment the duke of York, who when on the throne gave him a captain's commission. In 1721 he obtained for his "Spartan Dame" 150l. a high price at that time, and he was the first who extended the advantage of play-writing to a second and third night. The most affecting of his plays, and perhaps of all English plays, is his "Innocent Adultery," and the most finished is his "Oroonoko," or the Royal Slave, borrowed from a true story from Mrs. Behn's novel. He wrote besides Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage, and also the Disappointment, and the Rambling Lady, comedies. The last 10 years of his life he lived at Westminster, and was there a regular attendant at the abbey service. He died 26th May, 1746, aged 83. He has been blamed for mixing tragedy and comedy, together, a monstrous impropriety, of which it is said, he was, in his latter days fully sensible, though he had thus complied with the vitiated taste of the times. His dramatic works were published by T. Evans, 3 vols. 12mo.

SOZOMEN, Hermias, a native of Palestine, who practised as an advocate at Constantinople, and was author of an Ecclesiastical History from 324 to 439. He died about 450.

SPAGNOLETTO, Joseph Ribera, a painter, born at Xativa, near Valentia, 1589. Though born of poor parents his industry enabled him to travel into Italy, and after studying the best masters at Parma and Rome, and copying the beauties of Carravaggio and Correggio, he settled at Naples, where his abilities were patronized and encouraged by the viceroy, and the great men of Europe. His pencil delighted in works of horror, and therefore scenes of torture, and of martyrdom, the torments of Ixion, and Prometheus, and Cato tearing his own bowels, are painted by him with such great correctness, and such forcible expression as to astonish and terrify the beholders. He died 1656.

SPAGNOLI, Baptist, a native of Mantua, who became general of the Carmelites, and distinguished himself by the sound and virtuous regulations which he attempted to introduce among the corrupted members of his order. He devoted himself much to studious pursuits, and wrote verses with great facility, but not always with equal success. His works containing ecloges and other poems, and prose miscellanies, &c. were edited at Venice, 1499, 4to. and at Antwerp 1576, 4 vols. 8vo. He died 20th March, 1516, aged 72.

SPALLANZANI, Lazarus, a celebrated naturalist. He was born at Scandiano near Reggio, 1729, and studied at Bologna, after which he retired to private meditation. Being elected professor at Pavia he devoted himself to natural history, and made various and important experiments in physiology. In 1779 he began to travel, and in 1785 he visited Constantinople, the plains of Troas, and the the islands of Corfu and Cythera. He afterwards came to Vienna where the emperor Joseph received him with great ceremony and every mark of esteem, and on his return to Pavia he was greeted by the most affectionate respect of his pupils and friends. In 1788 he went to Naples and Sicily, and examined, with philosophical accuracy, the wonders and the productions of the Appenines. He died of an apoplexy 12th Feb. 1799 at Pavia. He published, Letters on the Origin of Fountains — Experiments on the Re-production of Animals — Essay on Animalculæ in Fluids — Microscopical Experiments — Memoirs on the Circulation of the Blood — Observations on the Transpiration of Plants — Travels in the two Sicilies and the Appenines, 6 vols. — Correspondence with eminent Men — Observations on the Influence of Confined Air, &c.

SPANHEIM, Frederic, divinity professor at Leyden, was born at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate, 1600. He was educated under his father, a learned man, and then studied at Heidelberg and Geneva. He refused a professorship at Lausanne, and in 1631 succeeded to a divinity chair at Geneva, which he left in 1642 to settle at Leyden, where he had been honorably invited. Here he distinguished himself as a professor, and also as a preacher, in the Walloon church, and was respected by the queen of Bohemia, the prince of Orange, and Christina of Sweden. He died May, 1649. He wrote Exercitationes de Gratiâ Universalis, 3 vols. 8vo. — Dubia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to. — the Swiss Mercury — Life of count Dhona, 4to. &c.

SPANHEIM, Ezekiel, a learned writer and statesman, eldest son of the preceding, born at Geneva, 1629. He early displayed great abilities, and at the age of 16 he wrote an ingenious defence of Buxtorf against Capellus, in favor of the Hebrew characters which his antagonist declared had been lost by the Jews, but preserved by the Samaritans. This performance he afterwards called unripe fruit, and candidly assented to the opinion of Capellus, which before he had attacked. On his father's death he left Leyden for Geneva, where he was honored with the title of professor of eloquence, and soon after he became tutor to the son of Charles Lewis, elector palatine. On this new appointment he devoted himself not only to literary pursuits, but to political studies, and was employed by the elector as envoy to the court of Rome, where he was treated with unusual respect by Christina of Sweden, and other great characters. After being employed by the elector in several negotiations, especially in Holland, at Mentz, at the congress of Breda, and in England, he next entered into the service of the elector of Brandenburg, and was his envoy extraordinary at Paris, and in London. When the elector of Brandenburg assumed the title of king, he created him his minister, baron of the Prussian dominions, nions, and again in 1702 employed him as his ambassador in England. He spent there the remainder of his days, and died 28th Oct. 1710, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Though so much engaged in political affairs, Spanheim wrote much and with great success and ability. The best known of his works are, De Præstantiâ, & Usu Numismatum Antiquorum, 2 vols. folio — Letters and Dissertations on Medals — Julian's works edited with notes, folio — besides Notes on some Classical Authors, published by his friends.

SPANHEIM, Frederic, son of Frederic, and brother to the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1632, and carried to Leyden by his father. He studied under Hereboord, Golius, and Boxtor, and after distinguishing himself as a preacher at Utrecht, he was invited to the chair of divinity at Heidelberg, by the elector palatine, 1565. After acquiring reputation here as a professor, he removed in 1670 to Leyden, where he succeeded to the professorship of divinity and sacred history with universal approbation. His laborious studies enfeebled his health, and he died 1701, in consequence of a palsy. He left only one son out of several children whom he had by three wives. His writings are very numerous, and were printed at Leyden, 3 vols. folio. They are chiefly on theological subjects, of which the chief is his Ecclesiastical History.

SPARROW, Anthony, a native of Depden, Suffolk, educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, from which he was expelled for refusing to subscribe to the covenant, 1643. On the restoration of the second Charles, he was placed at the head of his college, made archdeacon of Sudbury, and in 1667 raised to the see of Exeter, from which he was translated to Norwich. He compiled a collection of Articles, Injunctions, Canons, &c. and also published Rationale, or the book of Common Prayer, 1657, 8vo. improved afterwards with additions, and again edited 1722. This pious and learned divine died in his diocese, 1685.

SPARTACUS, a Thracian shepherd, who escaped from a school of gladiators, and collected so formidable a number of adherents, that he was enabled to conquer some of the Roman armies. He was at last defeated by Crassus, B. C. 71.

SPARTIANUS, Ælius, a Latin historian, author of the Lives of the Roman emperors from Cæsar to Dioclesian.

SPEED, John, a celebrated historian, born at Farington, Cheshire, 1555. Though originally a tailor, and of some eminence in his profession, he abandoned the needle for the pen, and in 1596, under the patronage of Mr. Fulke Greville, he published his "Theatre of Great Britain," afterwards improved and enlarged. His History of Great Britain under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, appeared 1614, dedicated to James I. and was recommended by verses from sir Henry Spelman, and other learned men. He published also, 1616, the Cloud of Witnesses, or Genealogies of Scripture, &c. a valuable book of divinity, often bound up with the bible. He died 28th July, 1629, and was buried in St. Giles's, Cripplegate. He had 12 sons and six daughters by his wife, who died the year before him, after an union of 57 years. He was an able antiquary, and had his education been equal to the powers of his natural genius, as Nicolson observes, he would greatly have outdone himself.

SPELMAN, sir Henry, an eminent antiquary, born at Congham, near Lynn, Norfolk, of a respectable family, 1561. He was two years at Trinity college, Cambridge, and then entered at Lincoln's inn. He was sheriff for Norfolk, 1604, and became so well known for his abilities, that James sent him three different times into Ireland on public business, and appointed him at home one of the commissioners to inquire into the fees exacted in all the courts and offices of England. He received a present of 300l. for his services, and was knighted by the king. When 50 years old, he settled in London with his wife, and devoted himself there totally to literary pursuits, and to the company and correspondence of the great and the learned of the age; of Usher, Williams, Selden, Cotton, Abbot, Laud, Dugdale, Salmasius, Rigaltius, Bignonius, and others. He founded a Saxon lectureship at Cambridge, but the intervention of the civil wars prevented the full execution of his wishes in this respect. He died in London, 1641, and was buried in Westminster abbey, near Camden. He had eight children, four sons and four daughters, the eldest of which sons, John, was knighted by king Charles I. and was made master of Sutton's hospital. Sir Henry was member of the old society of antiquaries, and wrote several valuable works, the best known of which are, "de non Temerandis Ecclesiis," against sacrilege, or alienating the church lands — Glossarium Archæologicum, of which only the first part to the letter L, was published by himself, 1626; a second volume was collected from his papers, and published by sir William Dugdale after the restoration — an edition of the English Councils, 2 vols. folio, of which the second volume was edited by sir William Dugdale also — Villare Anglicanum, folio — Reliquiæ Spelmaniæ, folio; edited by Gibson, 1698, and again reprinted by the same learned editor in 1723. Sir John, the son, wrote among other things, two political tracts — Alfred's Life, &c. and died 25th July, 1643, greatly esteemed by the king. His funeral sermon was preached and published by Usher. — Clement, the youngest son of sir Henry, was also a learned man, and made one of the judges of the exchequer after the restoration. He wrote a Discourse on the Time of observing Easter — tracts on Astrology — Rules for judging the Weather, &c. and died June, 1679, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Fleet-street.

SPENCE, Joseph, an elegant scholar and divine, born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he was fellow. In 1727 he published "an Essay on Pope's Odyssey," &c. which, though coldly praised by Dr. Johnson, is allowed by Warton to possess great merit; and indeed, far from irritating the poet, it procured his friendship, and to that connection the critic owed some of the preferment which he afterwards held. In 1728 he was elected poetry professor at Oxford, and travelled as tutor with lord Lincoln, afterwards duke of Newcastle. In 1742 he was made professor feffor of modern history, and also obtained from his college Great Horwood rectory in Buckinghamshire, where he never resided, and in 1754 he was promoted to a stall in Durham cathedral. On the 20th Aug. 1768, he was found drowned in a canal in his garden at Byfleet, and though the particulars of the melancholy accident must remain unknown, it is generally supposed that in a fit he fell with his face downwards into the water, where it was too shallow to cover his head, and was thus suffocated. He published an Account of his friend Stephen Duck, 1731 — an Account of the Life and Writings of Blacklock — some pieces preserved in Doddsley's Miscellany, and other compositions; but the work for which he is deservedly admired as a man of genius and of taste, is his "Polymetis," or an Inquiry on the Agreement of the Roman poets, and the Remains of Ancient Artists, to illustrate each other, folio, 1747. This work, though fastidiously censured by Gray, has met with universal approbation, and has been highly commended by Lowth, Johnson, and Warton. Our amiable author made several communications about Pope, whom he attended in his last moments, to his friend Warton, and as he had formed memorials of his conversation, his assistance must be considered as valuable, and his anecdotes as authentic.

SPENCER, John, an ingenious divine, born in Kent, 1630, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1667 master. In 1677 he was made dean of Ely, and after a life usefully devoted to literature and religion, he died May, 1695, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He published some occasional sermons; but his works best known are a Discourse concerning Prodigies, &c. a learned composition — a Latin Dissertation concerning Urim and Thummim, 1668 — and in 1685 his celebrated work de Legibus Hebræorum Ritualibus, & eorum Rationibus, which has met with opposition from various quarters, because while he vindicates the ways of God to men, he asserts that many of the rites and ceremonies of the Jews are deduced from the practices of their heathen neighbours. This work was edited with the author's notes by Leonard Chappelow, Cambridge, 1727, folio.

SPENCER, William, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, published, in 1658, Origen's eight books against Celsus, &c. in 4to. with annotations, and a Latin version.

SPENER, Philip James, a Lutheran divine, of Frankfurt on the Maine, born in Alsatia, 1635. He became in 1680 founder of a new sect called Pietists, which maintained that only persons inspired by the Holy Ghost could understand the scriptures, a doctrine which produced many enthusiasts, and was at last checked by the interference of the civil power. He settled at Dresden, and afterwards at Berlin, where he held some ecclesiastical dignities, and died 1705, aged 70.

SPENSER, Edmund, a celebrated English poet, born at London, and educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree 1576. He left Cambridge upon being an unsuccessful candidate for a fellowship at Pembroke, and for some time resided with some friends in the North, where he fell in love with his fair Rosalind, whose beauties and cruelty he has laboriously painted. His first publication was the Shepherd's Calendar, which was dedicated to sir Philip Sidney, a great favorite at court, and a fond admirer of good poetry. By means of this worthy patron, he was introduced at court, and appointed poet laureat, with a salary of 50l. and his verses pleased Elizabeth so much, that she ordered Burleigh to present him rool. to which the sagacious minister objected as being too much for a song. "Then give him," replied the queen, "what is reason." The gratuity, however, was delayed, till the impatient poet presented to the queen the following lines:

I was promised on a time,
To have reason for my rhyme,
From that time until this season,
I received nor rhyme nor reason:

which were graciously received, and immediately obtained the promised reward. He was afterwards employed by lord Grey de Wilton, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, as his secretary, and for his faithful services he was rewarded with a grant of 3000 acres of land in the county of Cork, and in the mansion on this estate, he spent some time, and completed his celebrated poem, "the Faery Queen." The rebellion, however, disturbed his repose; he was plundered and robbed of his estate, and broken in heart and fortune, he came to London, where he died 1598. He was interred in Westminster abbey, near Chaucer. A monument was erected to his memory by Robert Devereux, earl of Essex. Though he is said on his monument to have been born 1510, and to have died 1596, these dates are false according to Camden, who fixes the time of his death 1598. As a poet Spenser is deservedly regarded as little inferior either in invention or in judgment, and in the true fire of the muse, to any author in ancient or modern times. But with all his beauties, he was, says Rymer, fanciful and chimerical, and without uniformity, so that his poem is truly fairy land. His language unfortunately is becoming obsolete, and the form of his stanzas is heavy and ill-judged; but though his characters are generally all equal in the possession of moral virtues, and not drawn with sufficient discrimination; and though for every adventure a hero is raised by the inventive powers of the poet, yet the composition is interesting, grand, and sublime, full of variety, and animated by the happy efforts of a most fertile imagination. The best edition of this valuable poem is that published by Todd, in 6 vols. 8vo. with notes, 1805.

SPERLING, Otto, a native of Hamburg, who studied medicine in Italy, and after travelling in Dalmatia, settled as physician at Bergen in Norway. He afterwards went to reside at Copenhagen, as physician to the king of Denmark; but he was involved in the disgrace of count Ulfeld, and was sent to prison, 1664, where he died after a long confinement, 1681. He wrote a Catalogue of the Plants of Denmark, 1642, 12mo. &c.

SPERLING, John, a native of Zeuchfeld in Thuringia, ringia, professor of medicine at Wittenberg; where he died 1658, aged 55. He was author of Institutiones Physicæ — Anthropologiæ Physicæ, &c.

SPERONE, Speron, a polite writer, born at Padua, 1500. He lived for some time at Rome, patronized by Pius IV. who knighted him, and employed him in embassies to Venice, France, and Spain. He died at Padua, 1588. His works are written in excellent Italian, and consist of orations, dialogues, letters, dissertations, and a tragedy, called Canace.

SPIELMAN, James Reinhold, a physician, born 1722, at Strasburg. After travelling over Europe, and residing some time at Berlin, he returned to his native city, where, as professor of medicine and chemistry, his lectures were attended by numerous and respectable classes. He promoted the establishment of a botanical garden at Strasburg, which is now one of its principal ornaments, and he died Sept. 1782, universally esteemed. He published Elementa Chymicæ, 8vo. — Prodromus Floræ Argentinensis, 8vo. — Institutiones Materiæ Medicæ — Syllabus Medicamentorum — Pharmacopœia Generalis, 4to. &c.

SPIERINGS, Henry, a native of Antwerp, born 1633, and eminent as a painter of landscapes. His pictures exhibit great skill and judgment, and his trees and rural scenery are particularly admired.

SPIERS, Albert Van, an admired historical painter, born at Amsterdam. He improved his talents by studying in Italy, and afterwards settled in his native country, where he acquired celebrity and fortune. He died 1718, aged 52.

SPIGELIUS, Adrian, a native of Brussels, professor of surgery and anatomy at Padua. He died at Brussels, 1625, aged 47. His works were published at Amsterdam, 1645, in folio. The smaller lobe of the liver bears his name, as he is supposed to have discovered it.

SPIILBERG, John, a native of Dusseldorf, first painter to the elector palatine. His altar pieces, portraits, and historical drawings, possessed great beauty. He died 1691, aged 72. His daughter Adriana excelled as an artist in crayons. She married Vander Neer.

SPIILBERG, George, a Dutch admiral, who defeated the Spaniards in the south seas about 1616. An Account of his Adventures is published among the Dutch voyages.

SPINCKES, Nathanael, an eminent divine, born at Castor, Northamptonshire, 1654. He entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, and though after his father's death, possessed of a respectable fortune, he applied for a Rustat scholarship at Jesus, which he obtained as an honorable proof of his abilities after a strict and prolonged examination. In 1681 he was chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, and in 1685 obtained the rectory of Peakirk, Northamptonshire, and afterwards was promoted to a stall at Salisbury, and to the rectory of St. Mary in that city. He, however, lost all his preferments in 1690, for refusing to take the oaths to William, and lived afterwards in some distress, and in dependence upon the contributions of other nonjurors, of whom he was elected one of the bishops. He died 28th July, 1727, and was buried in St. Faith's cemetery, north side of St. Paul's. By his wife, who died seven days after him, he had many children, of whom only two survived him. He wrote various pious books and devotions — the Sick Man visited, a sixth edition of which appeared 1775.

SPINELLO, Aretino, an Italian painter, born at Arezzo in Tuscany, 1328. His portraits, madonnas, and historical pieces, were much admired, and are highly finished. He died 1420. His son Paris, was also an eminent painter, and died 1422, aged 56. It is said of him that, in a picture of the fallen angels, he represented the devil in so hideous a form, that the evil spirit haunted him in his dreams, and demanded with threats what authority he had to give him so horrible a delineation.

SPINOLA, Ambrose, a famous general in the service of Spain, where he was born 1569, but descended from a Genoese family. He distinguished himself in Flanders, and as commander in chief, took Ostend, 1604. His abilities were eminently displayed against Maurice of Nassau, the greatest hero of the age, whom he opposed with skill and military judgment. After the truce of 1608, he lived in retirement, till fresh troubles called him again to take the field, and to make Aix-la-Chapelle, Wesel, and Breda, submit to his arms. In 1629 he was employed in Italy, where he took Casal; but the court of Spain disconcerted his measures, and prevented his obtaining possession of the citadel, in consequence of which he fell sick, and died soon after, 1630, exclaiming, "they have robbed me of my honor."

SPINOZA, Benedict de, an atheistical writer, son of a Portuguese Jew, born at Amsterdam, 1638. He studied medicine and theology, but his religion was so loose, and his inquiries for the reason of every thing which he was to believe, became so offensive to the rabbis, that he was thrust out of the synagogue. In consequence of this he became a Christian, and was baptized; but his conversion was insincere, and though during his life he did not openly profess himself an atheist, his posthumous works plainly proved him such. He died of a consumption at the Hague, Feb. 1677, aged 45. He is the founder of a regular system of atheism, and by his hypothesis he wished to establish that there is but one substance in nature, which is endowed with infinite attributes, with extension and thought; that all spirits are modifications of that substance, and that God, the necessary and most perfect being, is the cause of all things that exist, but does not differ from them. These monstrous doctrines, though not new, were thus built into a regular system by this extraordinary man, who is said in other respects to have been of a good moral character in private life, benevolent, friendly, and charitable. His conduct was marked by no licentiousness or irregularity; but he retired from the tumults of Amsterdam, to a more peaceful residence at the Hague, where curiosity led princes, philosophers, and learned men to see and to converse with this bold asserter of atheism. His works were "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus," 4to. 1670 — Opera Posthuma, 4to. Few have studied died the abstract and difficult principles of Spinoza, and fewer have followed them. Toland may be said to approach nearest, as a free-thinker, in his "Panthæisticon," to the opinions of the Dutch philosopher, and his sentiments seem in some degree to be the repetition of those of his atheistical predecessor.

SPIRA, Francis, a Venetian lawyer of eminence in the 16th century. Being accused before the papal nuncio of favoring the tenets of the reformation, he was compelled to make a public recantation of his opinions to save his life, and this had such effect upon his spirits, that he was seized with a dreadful melancholy, which baffled all the aid of medicine, and carried him to his grave, under the most poignant agonies of mind, 1548.

SPON, Charles, an ingenious Frenchman, born at Lyons, 1609. He studied at Ulm and Paris, and in 1632, went to Montpellier, to devote himself more attentively to medicine. He took his degree of M. D. there, and settled at Lyons, where he practised with great success, and died 21st Feb. 1684, highly respected. He was an excellent scholar, and had such facility of writing Latin verses, that Bayle says he had a copy of some of his iambics, on the Deluge and last Conflagration, which, though written at the age of 14, would have done credit to established abilities, if composed in moments of leisure. He had an extensive correspondence with the learned of Europe, and was particularly attached to Gassendus, and to his philosophy. He published the Prognostics of Hippocrates, in hexameter verses, dedicated to his friend Guy Patin.

SPON, James, son of the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1647, and after a careful education, was admitted doctor of medicine at Montpellier, 1667, and member of the Lyons college of physicians two years after. In 1675 he began to travel into Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant, in company with Mr. Wheeler, of which he published an interesting account. He left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 1685, with the intention of retiring to Zurich, but died on the way at Vevay, on the lake Lemán, 1696. He was member of several learned societies, and was a most respectable character, than in whom, says Bayle, the qualities of a learned and of an honest man were never more happily united. He wrote various works, the best known of which are, Recherches des Antiquités de Lyons, 8vo. 1674 — Ignotorum atque Obscurorum Deorum Aræ, 8vo. 1677 — Histoire de la Ville & de l'Etat de Geneve, 2 vols. 12mo. 1680 — Voyage de la Grece & du Levant, 3 vols. 12mo. 1677 — Recherches Curieuses d'Antiquité, 4to. 1683 — Miscellanea, &c.

SPONDANUS, John, or DE SPONDE, a learned man, born at Mauleon de Soule in Biscay, 1557. At the age of 20 he began a commentary on Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, printed at Basil, 1583, folio, full of much erudition, though sometimes trifling. He abjured the reformed religion, and left the court of his patron, Henry of Navarre, afterwards the fourth of France, and retired to the mountains of Biscay. He died 1595, and was buried at Bourdeaux. He published Aristotle's Logic in Greek and Latin, at Basil, with notes, 1583.

SPONDANUS, Henry, younger brother of the preceding, was born 1568, and educated at the reformed college of Ortez. He became early eminent for his knowledge of Greek and Latin, and afterwards studied the civil and canon law, and recommended himself to the notice of Henry IV. of France, then prince of Bearn, who made him master of the requests at Navarre. He abandoned the protestant religion 1595, and then retiring to Rome, took orders, and obtained, on his return to France, the see of Pamiers from Lewis XIII. He died at Toulouse, 1643. He abridged his friend Baronius' Annales Ecclesiastici, and wrote besides, Annales Sacri a Mundi Creatione ad ejusdem Redemptionem, &c.

SPOTSWOOD, John, archbishop of St. Andrew's, was descended from an ancient family, and born 1565. He was educated at Glasgow, where he distinguished himself, and afterwards attended as chaplain the duke of Lenox, in his embassy to France, and when James I. took possession of the English throne in 1603, he was in the number of his attendants. That year he was made bishop of Glasgow, and privy counsellor of Scotland, and in 1615 was translated to the see of St. Andrew's. In 1633 he crowned Charles I. as king of Scotland at Holyrood-house, and in 1635 was made chancellor of the kingdom. The troubles of the country obliged him to leave his situation, and he retired to England, where he sunk under his infirmities, and the melancholy state of public affairs. He died in London, 1639, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote an History of the Church of Scotland, published 1655, folio. It was begun at the command of James I. and is regarded as accurate. His second son for Robert, was a man of abilities, patronized like his father by James I. and by his successor. He shared the fortunes of the great Montrose, and was put to death with him.

SPRAGG, Edward, a valiant Englishman. He commanded the Royal Charles in the first engagement with the Dutch fleet in 1665, and behaved with such courage, that the king knighted him in his own ship. The following year he distinguished himself under the duke of Albermarle, in the fight which continued four days with the Dutch, and in 1667 he contributed to the defeat of the same enemy by burning some of their ships when they attempted to sail up the Thames. He was employed in 1671 against the Algerines in the Mediterranean, where he destroyed seven of their men of war; but two years after he was unfortunately drowned in the dreadful engagement with Van Tromp, as he was passing in a small boat from his ship, which was sinking in the fight, to another.

SPRANGHER, Bartholomew, an eminent painter, born at Antwerp, 1546. He was at Rome, and was patronized by cardinal Farnese, and by Pius V. for whom he painted the "Day of Judgment" at Belvidere. On his return to Germany he was in the service of the emperor Maximilian II. and was so great a favorite with his successor Rodolphus, that he was honored with a gold medal, and with a pension, and raised to the rank of nobility. He visited his country in his old age, and every where heard his productions admired. He died at Prague, 1623.

SPRAT, Thomas, an English prelate, born at Tallaton, Devonshire, 1636, and educated at Wadham college, of which he became fellow. He here began to cultivate poetry, and published in 1659 his poem on the death of Cromwell, dedicated to Dr. Wilkins. He afterwards wrote the "Plague of Athens," a poem, and another poem on the death of Cowley. After the restoration he took orders, and was chaplain to Buckingham, and then to the king. He also became an active promoter of the establishment of the Royal society, of which he was one of the first members, and of whose labors he published the history, 1667. He next wrote Observations on Sorbiere's Voyage to England, and in 1668 edited his friend Cowley's poems. Thus distinguished as a writer, he was amply rewarded by preferments. In 1668 he became prebendary of Westminster, afterwards minister of St. Margaret's church, canon of Windsor, and in 1683 dean of Westminster, and next year bishop of Rochester. In 1685 he was prevailed upon to write the history of the Rye-house plot, and as he had been liberally noticed by James II. and made dean of the chapel royal, he was appointed one of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs. In this office he acted with some timidity, and then at last withdrew; but when it was debated whether the throne was vacant by the flight of James, he boldly stood the manly advocate of his master. He, however, submitted to the revolution, and took the oaths; but an infamous attempt was made by some unprincipled informers to involve him in trouble by forging his name, and by introducing into his house the plan of a pretended plot, all which, however, proved his innocence, and after some confinement, left him the exercise of his episcopal duties. He died 20th May, 1713. His character is delineated with some degree of asperity by Burnet; but it should be remembered that they were rivals and enemies, and that while Burnet preached before the Commons, he made the pulpit the vehicle of sedition, and Sprat there displayed his zeal and loyalty in favor of the government. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote a Relation of the wicked Conspiracy of Stephen Blackhead and Robert Young, who united to rob him of his Honor and of his Life — and also sermons, 8vo. — poems, &c. It has been observed that every book of his composition is of a different kind, and has its distinct and characteristic excellence.

SPURSTOW, William, D. D. master of Catherine hall, Cambridge, from which he was expelled in the civil wars for refusing the engagement, was afterwards minister of Hackney, of which he was deprived in 1662, for nonconformity. He was member of the Westminster assembly of divines, and assisted also at the Savoy conference. He was author of a treatise on the Promises, 8vo. — the Spiritual Chemist, 8vo. — the Wiles of Satan, and sermons, and died 1666. He was also engaged in the attack on episcopacy, under the name of Smeatymnus, Vid. Newcomen.

SQUARCIONE, Francis, an Italian painter, who acquired such celebrity, that he was called the father of painters. He improved himself by viewing the most valuable antiquities preserved in ancient Greece, and died 1474, aged 80.

SQUIRE, Samuel, D. D. a learned prelate, son of an apothecary at Warminster, Wilts, where he was born 1714. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and afterwards was successively made archdeacon of Bath, rector of Topsfield, Essex, in 1750 rector of St. Anne's Westminster, vicar of Greenwich, and in 1760, dean of Bristol. The following year he was raised to the see of St. David's, and died May, 6th 1766. In the various characters of pastor, bishop, husband, father, and friend, he was a most excellent and amiable pattern. He left two sons and a daughter. The best known of his works are, a Defence of the Ancient Greek Chronology — and an Enquiry into the Origin of the Greek Language, 8vo. — an Enquiry into the Nature of the English Constitution, 8vo. — Indifference to Religion inexcusable, 12mo. — the Principles of Religion made easy to Young Persons, &c. — a character of his first patron Herring, &c.

STAAL, Madame de, a French lady, daughter of a painter called de Launai, well educated in a convent by the favor of the abbess. She was in the service of the duchess of Maine, and shared her disgrace by being confined two years in the bastille, and afterwards she married de Staal an officer of the Swiss guards. She died 1750, leaving her memoirs, published afterwards in 3 vols. 12mo. to which a fourth was afterwards added, containing two comedies. She possessed great wit and vivacity, as her memoirs fully prove, and it was this which recommended her to the notice and friendship of la Fontenelle, and other learned men.

STABEN, Henry, a Flemish painter, who studied under Tintoret, and acquired celebrity by his historical pieces, and particularly by his views of perspective. He died 1658, aged 80.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, a pious divine, for some years curate of Finchley, and afterwards vicar of Beenharn, Berks, where he died 11th Oct. 1752. He wrote several things, and among them a History of the Bible, 2 vols. folio, a popular and valuable work, often reprinted — a System of Practical Divinity, fol. — a Treatise on the Miseries of the inferior Clergy, 8vo. — a Review of the Controversy concerning Miracles, &c. a complete Body of Divinity — an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed, &c.

STADIUS, John, a native of Loenhout, in Brabant, who became professor of history at Louvain, and afterwards filled the chair of mathematics and history at Paris, where he died 1579, aged 52. His knowledge of mathematics was disgraced by his fondness for astrological calculations. He wrote, Ephemerides, 4to. — Tabula Aequabilis & Apparentis Motus Coelestium Corporum — a Latin Commentary on Florus — Fasti Romanorum, &c.

STAFFORD, Antony, a writer, descended from a noble family, and born in Northamptonshire. He received his education at Oriel college, Oxford, and was made master of arts, 1623. He was a man of great learning, learning, and died 1641. His works are, Niobe dissolved into Nilus, or his age drowned in her own Tears, 12mo. — Meditations and Resolutions, 12mo. — Life and Death of Diogenes — the Life of the Virgin Mary, or Female Glory — the Pride of Honor — Honor and Virtue triumphant over the Grave, exemplified in the Life and Death of Henry lord Stafford, 4to. His Female Glory proved very offensive to the puritans of England.

STAHL, George Ernest, an eminent German chemist, born in Franconia, 1660. He studied medicine, and was, in 1694, made professor of that science, on the foundation of the university of Hall. His reputation was so great that he was honorably invited to Berlin in 1716, and became there physician to the king, and counsellor of state. He died there 1734. As a chemist, he obtained great and deserved celebrity for nearly 50 years, and was the author of the Doctrine of Phlogiston. As a physician, he was fanciful, and maintained that every muscular action, whether from consciousness or not, proceeded from the will of the mind, which he asserted had at all time absolute power over the body. Of his valuable works these are the best known, Experimenta & Observationes Chemicæ & Physicæ, 8vo. — Theoria Medica Vera, 8vo. — a German Treatise on Sulphur, 12mo. — Opusculum Chymico-Physico-Medicum, 4to. — Fundamenta Chymicæ Dogmaticæ & Experimentalis, 3 vols. 4to. — Negotium Otiosum, 4to. — Commentarium in Metallurgicum Beccheri — a German treatise on Salts, &c.

STAHRMBERG, Conrad Balchazar, count de, governor of Vienna, is celebrated for the brave defence which he made when the city was besieged in 1683, by the Turks. He died at Rome, 1687.

STAHRMBERG, Guido Balde, count de, an Austrian general, who raised himself by merit to the highest military honors. He displayed great gallantry at the battle of Zenta, and by his courage and military skill ensured the victory of Saragossa, 1719. He died at Vienna, 1737, aged 80.

STALBENT, Adrian, a native of Antwerp, distinguished as a painter. He is very happy in his delineations of nature, and, to great correctness, unites strong judgment. He died 1660, aged 80.

STAMPART, Francis, a painter, born at Antwerp, 1675. He settled at Vienna, where his abilities recommended him to the notice of the emperor, who made him his cabinet painter. He died there, 1750.

STANHOPE, George, an able divine, born at Hartshorn, Derbyshire, March, 1660, of a respectable family, which had suffered much during the civil wars. He was removed from Uppingham school to Eton, and was elected to King's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of D. D. 1697. He first obtained Tewling rectory, Hertfordshire, and afterwards Lewisham in Kent, by the favor of lord Dartmouth, in whose family he had been tutor, and soon after he became chaplain to the king. In 1701, he preached Boyle's lectures, and two years after exchanged Tewling for the vicarage of Deptford, and soon after was made dean of Canterbury in the room of Hooper, raised to the see of Bath and Wells. These preferments were due to his integrity, learning, and piety, and, as one of our ablest divines, his writings must always be held in high esteem. This worthy man, whose private life was as virtuous and exemplary as his public conduct was useful, died 18th March, 1728, aged 68, and was buried in Lewisham chancel. He was twice married, and by his first wife, Olivia Cotton, he had one son and four daughters. The second wife survived him. The best known of his works are a Translation of Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, 8vo. — a Translation of Charron on Wisdom, 3 vols. 8vo. — Translation of M. Aurel. Antoninus' Meditations, 4to. — sermons on several occasions — a Translation of Epictetus, with Simplicius' Commentary, 8vo. — Paraphrase on the Epistles and Gospels, 4 vols. 8vo. — the Truth and Excellence of the Christian Religion, in sermons preached at Boyle's lectures, 4to. — Translations of Rochefoucaud's Maxims, 8vo. — of St. Augustine's Meditations — of Bishop Andrews' Greek Devotions — Parsons' Christian Directory, 8vo. — the Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion, &c.

STANHOPE, James, earl of, of an ancient Nottinghamshire family, was born 1673. He embraced the military profession, and for his services at the siege of Namur, in 1695, king William gave him a company, and the rank of colonel. He served under the great Peterborough in Spain, and distinguished himself at the siege of Barcelona, and at the victories of Almanza and Saragossa; but he was obliged to surrender the citadel of Briheuga to the forces of Vendome, after a very brave resistance. Under George I. he was made secretary of state, and in 1714 went as ambassador to Vienna, and in 1717 was appointed first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer. These services to his country were rewarded with an earldom. He died 3d Feb. 1721.

STANHOPE, Philip Dormer, earl of Chesterfield, a distinguished nobleman and able writer, born in London, 22d Sept. 1694. After a private education he entered at the age of 18, at Trinity hall, Cambridge, where he studied the classics with great assiduity. In 1714, after two years' residence he left the university to make the tour of Europe, and after receiving lessons of gaming at the Hague, and polishing his manners under the tuition of the dissipated belles of Paris, and visiting Italy, he returned home the next year. He became gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, and in the first parliament of George I. was elected member for St. Germain's, and then began his political career. He proved himself an able and accomplished speaker; but after defending the septennial bill he followed the prince of Wales in his opposition to the measures of the court, and no offers could persuade him to espouse the cause of the ministry. The death of his father, in 1726, removed him to the house of lords, and in this place he began to distinguish himself more as an orator than he had done in the house of Commons. Elegant and perspicuous in his delivery, with an inexhaustible command of language, adorned by all the graceful arts of high bred urbanity and sportive facetiousness, he acquired decisive superiority above all other orators, and rivetted the attention of his auditors by the dignified and vehement powers of his eloquence, and the fascinating touches of his raillery and humor. When George the second was raised to the throne, Chesterfield, who had faithfully served him, was placed in offices of trust and honor. He was in 1728, sent ambassador to Holland, and for his services there, was rewarded with the garter, and the office of high steward of the household. He returned, in 1732, to England; but his determined opposition to Walpole stripped him of his offices, and he desisted from attending the court, where he was now received with coldness and indifference. During 12 years he continued to attack the measures of government from the ranks of opposition; but the coalition of parties, in 1744, restored him to a seat in the cabinet, and the following year he was again engaged in a short embassy in Holland. He hastened back from the continent, to take the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland, and in this high situation he had the happiness, by the mildness of his government, to conciliate the affections of the Irish nation. He left Ireland in 1746, and became principal secretary of state, but resigned two years after. Though infirmities and deafness came now rapidly upon him, yet he attended his duty in the house of lords, and in the debates, for the alteration of the style, 1751, he distinguished himself by an eloquent speech in favor of the plan. He lived with increasing infirmities to the 24th March, 1773. As a public character lord Chesterfield is highly esteemed, as from his rank, his influence, and his experience in political intrigues, he was, for many years a distinguished leader. He wished not only to appear a man of letters, but to be the patron of learned men; and his friendship with Pope, and the other wits of the time, ensured him celebrity. His conduct, however, to Dr. Johnson, from whom he expected an adulatory dedication of his dictionary, exposed him to the reprehension and indignant contempt of that unbending moralist. Lord Chesterfield wrote some papers in the World, and some poetical pieces, inserted in periodical publications; but his fame as an author rests on the celebrated letters which he sent to his natural son. These letters are written in an elegant and fascinating style; but in wishing to form his son for the higher ranks of life, he has shown himself the advocate of hypocrisy, licentiousness, and infidelity. The applause of the world was the governing principle of his life; but it was not by virtue alone that the polished peer endeavoured to command popularity, but by every art which can, without hesitation, sacrifice honor, religion, and morality, to its favorite objects. The publication of his letters prove him to be an excellent scholar; but they display a studied relaxation of principle, and, as Johnson says, inculcate the morals of a strumpet with the manners of a dancing master. He was married to Melosina de Schulenborg, countess of Walsingham, but had no children. His favorite son, to whose education he had so ardently and anxiously devoted himself, died Nov. 1768, and left him in a state of deep and lasting despondency. His letters appeared first in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, and his miscellaneous works also, in 2 vols. 4to. 1777, and have since frequently been published in other forms.

STANISLAUS, Leczinski, king of Poland, was born at Leopold 20th Oct. 1677. He was son of the grand treasurer of the kingdom, and to an elegant person joined an insinuating address, which prevailed so much with Charles XII. of Sweden, to whom he was deputed in 1704, by the assembly of Warsaw, that he determined to make him master of the kingdom, which his valor had conquered. Stanislaus was accordingly crowned at Warsaw, 1705, in the room of the deposed Augustus, agreeably to the will of the victorious Swede, and he continued attached to his benefactor, till the defeat of the Swedes at the battle of Pultowa, and the incursions of the Russians rendered his situation dangerous, and obliged him to fly from the kingdom. Augustus was restored to his crown, but on his death, in 1733, Stanislaus though supported by the interest of Lewis XV. who had married his daughter, was unable to re-ascend the throne, and remained satisfied with the humbler title of duke of Lorraine and Bar, in which character he gained the affection of his new subjects, and deserved the name of the Beneficent. He died Feb. 23, 1766, in consequence of being burnt by his night gown catching fire. Stanislaus was author of "Œuvres du Philosophe Bienfaisant," 4 vols. 8vo. in which he delineates the character of a true philosopher, meaning himself.

STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS PONIATOWSKY, king of Poland, was son of a private gentleman in Lithuania, by the princess Czartorinski, of the illustrious family of the Jagellons, was born 1732. After receiving an excellent education he travelled to Paris, where the friendship of the Swedish ambassador recommended him to the notice of the great, but his expences were so extravagant that he was liberated from prison only by an act of generosity in the wife of a rich merchant. From Paris he came to London, and became intimately acquainted with sir William Hanbury, whom he accompanied in his embassy to Russia. The elegant person and high accomplishments of Poniatowsky here captivated the heart of the grand duchess, afterwards Catharine II. which gave so much offence to the empress Elizabeth, that the young favorite was recalled by order of Augustus III. of Poland. The death of Augustus in 1763, interested Catharine in the fortunes of her favorite, and by her influence, and the terror of her armies he was elected king of Poland, 7th Sep. 1764, in the diet of Wola. The new monarch gained all hearts by the moderation and prudence of his government, but unfortunately religious disputes disturbed the peace of the kingdom, the dissidents or protestants who had been excluded by the catholics from offices of trust and emolument laid claim to new indulgences, and were supported in their petition by the ambassadors of England, Prussia, and Russia. Stanislaus favored their cause, and thus rendered the catholics his most inveterate enemies, so that they formed the plan of taking him prisoner or destroying him. Three bold conspirators at the head of 40 dragoons disguised like peasants entered Warsaw, 3d Nov. 1771, and seized the unsuspecting king as he was returning in his carriage at ten of the clock of the evening. After much personal violence they mounted him on a horse, and rode away from the town, but during the darkness of the night night these assassins lost their road, and on the return of light, Stanislaus exhausted, found himself in the custody of only one of the conspirators, on whom he prevailed to conduct him back to Warlaw. In 1787, Stanislaus visited Kaniess, and after an absence of 23 years had an interview with Catharine whom he accompanied in her tour through Tauris and Caucasus, to the borders of Persia. Though loaded with presents and honors by this ambitious princess, the Polish king soon saw his dominions invaded by her armies, and in 1792, all his efforts and the valor of Kosciusko were unable to arrest the career of her arms. Wilna and Warlaw were taken, and Catharine after having frequently declared herself the protectress of the independence of Poland, consented to share the disunited kingdom with the emperor of Germany and the king of Prussia. In 1795, prince Repnin delivered a letter to the unfortunate Stanislaus, which commanded him to descend from the throne, and his people from the rank of nations. Stanislaus retired to Grodno, and forgot the dangers of greatness and of royalty in the obscurity of a private life, and afterwards on the accession of Paul to the Russian throne, he was sent for to Petersburg, where every mark of respect and attention was paid to him. He died at Petersburg, 11th April, 1798. This unfortunate man, if he had possessed more vigor and decision might have retarded if not totally averted the dangers which ruined the monarchy; but he was more calculated to shine in private life than adorn a throne, and uphold the fates of a falling empire. He was well informed and the friend of the learned, and he spoke and wrote with ease the seven languages of Europe.

STANLEY, Thomas, an elegant writer, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was knighted, and resided at Cumberlow-green, Herts, where he devoted himself to literature. He wrote poems and other things, but he is better known as the father of the learned Thomas Stanley, with whom he is confounded by Dr. Birch, &c.

STANLEY, Thomas, esq. son of the above, was born at his father's house, Herts, 1644. He was admitted at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a polite scholar, and good philologist. After taking his degrees he travelled through France, Italy, and Spain, and on his return entered at the Middle Temple. Not the law, however, but literature was his pursuit, and he published in 1665, an edition of Ælian's Various History with notes. His next work was the History of Philosophy, containing the lives, opinions, &c. of philosophers of every sect, 4to. dedicated to his uncle John Marsham, esq. a composition of great and acknowledged merit, which passed through four editions, and was translated into Latin for the use of the German literati—and in 1664, appeared his "Æschylus," cum Versione & Commentario. He wrote besides, various remarks on Eurides, Sophocles, and other classical authors, besides commentaries on Æschylus in 8 vols. fol. which have remained in manuscript. This worthy man who had thus early given such strong and valuable proofs of his learning and application, died in 1678, when scarce 34.

STANLEY, John, an English musician, born in London 1713. He lost his sight when two years old, and at the age of seven he devoted his attention to music, under the care of Dr. Green, and with such effect that he was chosen organist of All-Hallows church, Bread street, in his 11th year. In 1723, he was made organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn, in 1734, he was elected by the benchers, organist of the Temple church, and in 1779, he was nominated master of the king's band. His execution on the organ was particularly admired, and his compositions displayed the most correct taste, and the soundest judgment. He died 1786.

STANNINA, Gerard, a painter, born at Florence. He studied under Venetiano, and was eminent for the correctness of his historical pieces. He was patronized by the king of Spain, and died 1403, aged 59.

STANYHURST, Richard, a native of Dublin, son of the speaker of the Irish house of commons, was educated at University college, Oxford. After studying the law in London he returned to Ireland, and married, and became a Roman catholic. He afterwards went abroad, and entering into orders was appointed chaplain to Albert archduke of Austria, governor of the Netherlands. He died at Brussels, 1618, aged about 72. He was universally esteemed as a good divine, an eminent philosopher, and a tolerable poet and historian. He wrote various things, the best known of which are, de Rebus in Hibernia Gestis—Harmonia, seu Catena Dialectica in Porphyrium—Vita Sancti Patricii—the four first books of the Æneid translated into English hexameters—the Principles of the Catholic Religion, &c. He was uncle to archbishop Usher.

STAPLEDON, Walter, a native of Devonshire, educated at Oxford. His abilities recommended him to the notice of the court, and he was advanced in the church, and made bishop of Exeter, and treasurer of England. He distinguished himself as a patron of learning, and founded Exeter college, Oxford. His conduct in office rendered him afterwards unpopular, and he was seized in an insurrection in London, and cruelly beheaded at Cheapside cross, 1326.

STAPLETON, Thomas, an eminent controversialist, born at Henfield, Suffex, 1585, and educated at Canterbury and Winchester schools, from which he was removed to New college, Oxford. In Mary's reign he obtained a prebend of Chichester, but on Elizabeth's accession he left the kingdom with his family, and retired to Louvain, where he was made regius professor of divinity, canon of St. Peter's, and dean of Hilverbeck. He died 1598, and was buried in St. Peter's church at Louvain. He was an indefatigable writer in favor of the Roman catholic religion. His works were published in 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1620.

STAPYLTON, sir Robert, a native of Carleton, Yorkshire. Though the son of a catholic family, and educated at Douay, he became a protestant, and was gentleman to the prince of Wales, afterwards the second Charles. He was zealously attached to the fortunes of Charles I. and served with valor at the battle of Edgehill, and was knighted. At the restoration he was reinstated in his honors, and died 1669. He was a very intelligent man, and a poet of some merit. He translated Juvenal, and also wrote some plays, &c.

STAROVOLSKI, Simon, a native of Poland. He wrote in Latin a geographical account of his country, and lives of an hundred illustrious Polish writers. He flourished in the 17th century.

STATIRA, daughter of Darius, was taken at the battle of Issus, and became the wife of Alexander. She was murdered by Roxana, B. C. 323.

STATIUS, Pub. Papinius, a Latin poet, born at Naples. He was the flatterer of Domitian, and died about 100 A. D. His Thebais, and his Achilles remain, two heroic poems of considerable merit.

STAVELY, Thomas, esq. a native of Cuslington, Leicestershire, who was educated at Peter house, Cambridge, and afterwards studied the law at the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar 1654. He succeeded his father-in-law, Onebye, as steward of the records of Leicester, 1662, but the latter part of his life was clouded by habitual melancholy, probably arising from too intense an application to his studies. He died 1683. He wrote the Romish Horfeleech, or a discovery of the enormous exactions of the court of Rome, 8vo. — the History of Churches, and also made collections for the history and antiquities of Leicestershire.

STAUNTON, fr George Leonard, a native of Galway in Ireland. After finishing his education at home he passed into France, and studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree, and then returned to settle in London. In 1762, he went to Grenada, and became secretary to the governor, lord Macartney, whom after the capture of the island by the French he accompanied back to England. When his patron and friend went as governor to Madras, he attended him as his confidential secretary, and so great were his abilities, and so important his services, that on his return to Europe he was raised to the dignity of baronet, and received in the most honorable manner a pension from the East India company. In the embassy of lord Macartney to the court of China, sir George accompanied his noble friend as secretary of legation, and in consequence of the opportunities of information which he had, and the judicious observations which he made, he presented to the world a very valuable and interesting account of that mighty and populous empire, 2 vols. 4to. and three 8vo. Sir George was intimate with men of science and literature throughout Europe, and was made honorary doctor of laws by the university of Oxford. Among other things, he published a translation of the medical essays of Dr. Storck, a physician of Vienna. He died in London, 18th Jan. 1801.

STEBBING, Henry, an English divine, known for his attacks on Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy, and on Warburton on the publication of his Divine Legation. He died 1763, chancellor of the diocese of Salisbury. His other works are, sermons preached at Boyle's lecture, 8vo. — Collection of Tracts, 8vo. — sermons on Practical Christianity, 2 vols. — and Tracts against Dr. James Forster on the Subject of Heresy.

STEDMAN, John Gabriel, a native of Scotland, author of a narrative of an expedition against the revolted negroes in Surinam, with 80 plates, 2 vols. 4to. The work is interesting and accurate, as he was present at the transactions of which he relates the history. He died at Tiverton, 1797, aged 52.

STEELE, fr Richard, a celebrated English writer. He was born in Dublin, where his father a counsellor at law, was private secretary to the duke of Ormond. He came very young to England, and was educated at the Charter house, where he had Addison for his school-fellow. In 1695, he wrote "the Procession," on queen Mary's funeral, and afterwards obtaining an ensigncy in the guards, he wrote "the Christian Hero," to strengthen his mind in habits of religion and virtue, against those seducing pleasures to which a military life exposed him. This little work valuable for the morality and piety of its contents, was dedicated to lord Cutts, who in consequence noticed him, and not only made him his secretary, but gave him a captain's commission in Lucas' fusiliers. His first comedy called the Funeral, or Love-a-la-Mode was acted with great applause in 1702, and the next year the Tender Husband appeared, and in 1704, the Lying Lovers. By the friendship of Addison he was introduced to the patronage of lords Halifax and Sunderland, and obtained the appointment of gazetteer, and in 1709, under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, he began the Tatler, the first number of which was published 12th April, and the last 2d Jan. 1711. He next engaged with Addison in the Spectator, which first appeared 1st March, 1711, and afterwards in the Guardian, of which the first number appeared 12th March, 1713. He resigned in 1713, the place of commissioner of the stamp office, which he held, to sit in parliament for Stockbridge, but his parliamentary career was short, as his papers in the Englishman and in the Crisis, were voted by the house to be scandalous and seditious libels, and he was therefore after an able vindication of himself in a speech of three hours, expelled by a majority of 245 against 152. He now engaged in defending the rights of the house of Hanover, and in exposing the arts of the pretender, and in reward for his loyalty he was on the accession of George I. made surveyor of the royal stables at Hampton court, and governor of the royal company of comedians, and in 1715, knighted by the king. In the first parliament of the new monarch he was elected member for Boroughbridge in Yorkshire, and after the suppression of the rebellion he was made one of the commissioners of the forfeited estates in Scotland. Though engaged in offices of trust and business, Steele did not forget his character as a writer, but occasionally produced political pamphlets. His account of the Roman catholic religion throughout the world appeared in 1715, and it was followed by "a letter from the earl of Mar to the king," — a second volume of the Englishman — the Spinster — a Letter to Lord Oxford on the Peerage Bill — the Crisis of Property — the Nation a Family, on the South Sea Scheme. During the publication of "the Theatre," a periodical paper, his patent of governor of the comedians was withdrawn 1720, but though he exerted himself against the intrigues of the lord chamberlain, he never could recover recover it, though he computed the loss occasioned by that arbitrary measure little less than 10,000*l*. His comedy of the Conscious Lovers, appeared in 1722, and was received with great applause, and procured to him a present of 500*l*. from the king, to whom it was dedicated. In the decline of life Steele became paralytic, and retired to his seat of Llangunnor near Caermarthen, in Wales, where he died 1st Sep. 1729, and was very privately interred. He was twice married, by his first wife from whom he inherited a valuable plantation in Barbadoes, he left no children, and by the second who brought him the Welsh estate, he had one son and two daughters. As a writer Steele appears a very eminent character. The versatility of his talents, the extent of his information, and the deep acquaintance with polite literature, which he every where displayed, prove him to be an author of no ordinary rank, who would perhaps have shone to greater advantage if not united with the elegant Addison. Sir Richard in his private character was very eccentric, and often exposed himself to difficulties, from which all the interest and the ingenuity of his friends were required to extricate him. Among other methods which he adopted to better his fortune was the bringing fish alive to market, but though he obtained a patent, and wrote a pamphlet to vindicate his plan, he failed, and thus heavily narrowed his income.

STEEN, John, a painter, born at Leyden. He studied under Brouwer, and Van Goyen, and was very happy in his delineation of grotesque and comical characters. He died 1689, aged 53.

STEENWICK, Henry, a Flemish painter, who studied under John de Vries, and excelled chiefly in the representation of architectural subjects, and the inside of large buildings. He died 1603, aged 53. His son was also an artist of eminence, and died in London 1640.

STEEVENS, George, a native of London, educated at Kingston school, and King's college, Cambridge. He applied himself to polite literature, and in 1766, published 20 of Shakespeare's plays with notes, in 4 vols. 8vo. and his abilities as an annotator were so respectable, that Dr. Johnson joined him to himself in his edition of the immortal bard, which with their united labors appeared in 10 vols. 8vo. 1773. The text of Shakespeare was particularly familiar to this able critic, and therefore he published another edition of his works in 1793, in 15 vols. 8vo. and afterwards assisted in correcting the proofs of Boydell's splendid edition of the great dramatist. He died at his seat, Hampstead, 1800.

STEFANESCHI, John Baptist, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. He painted historical pieces, and also sacred subjects in miniature, for the collection of the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 1659, aged 77.

STEINBOCK, Magnus, an illustrious Swede. After distinguishing himself in Holland and Germany, he followed the fortunes of his master Charles XII. and contributed by his valor to the victories of Narva and of Poland. During the absence of his master from Sweden he governed the kingdom with wisdom and moderation, and defeated at Gadembock the Danes, who attempted to disturb the general tranquillity. He afterwards advanced against Altona, but was taken at Tonnigen, and died a prisoner of war in the castle of Frederickshaven, 23d Feb. 1717, aged 53. His memoirs have appeared in 4 vols. 4to. 1765. He is improperly called by some writers the last of Swedish heroes.

STELLA, James, an eminent painter, born at Lyons, 1596. He was much noticed by Cosimo de Medicis at Florence, and during a residence of seven years executed some excellent pieces of painting, designing, and engraving. He afterwards went to Rome, where he continued 11 years, and then returned to Paris, with the intention of going to Spain, but he was detained at Paris by the liberal patronage of Lewis XIII. and died there of a tedious consumption 1647. His pieces are much admired, and chiefly exhibit pastoral scenes, and the plays of children. His brother Francis was also eminent as a painter, but inferior to him. He died 1661.

STELLINI, James, a native of Forly in Italy, professor of divinity at Padua, where he died 1770, aged 71. He was an ecclesiastic, and was respected as a man of learning. He wrote on ethics, a valuable work published 4 vols. 4to. Padua, 1778.

STENO, Nicholas, a Danish anatomist, born at Copenhagen, 10th Jan. 1638. He studied under Bartholin, and afterwards travelled over Germany, Holland, France, and Italy, and obtained an honorable pension from Ferdinand II. grand duke of Tuscany, who appointed him tutor to his son. In 1669, he renounced the protestant religion, but the wish of his sovereign Christian V. to establish him as professor at Copenhagen, proved abortive, and he settled in Italy, and became an ecclesiastic. The pope in approbation of his conduct, appointed him apostolical vicar for Germany, and bishop of Titiopolis in Greece. He died at Schwerin, 1686. He was author of Elementorum Myologiae Specimen—Anatomical Observations and Discoveries, 1680, 12mo.—Latin Discourse on the Anatomy of the Brain, 12mo.

STEPHEN, St. first christian martyr, was one of the seven deacons, and had been a disciple of Gamaliel. He was in A. D. 33 stoned by the Jews, on a charge of blaspheming God and Moses, and in his death he exhibited the meek and patient sufferer, who prayed for forgiveness on his murderers.

STEPHEN I. pope, succeeded to the papal chair, after the martyrdom of Lucius, 253. He was engaged in a controversy with St. Cyprian and Firmilian, about rebaptizing penitents, who had been baptized before by heretics, and while he considered the imposing of hands upon such persons as sufficient to admit them into the church, his opponents held a contrary doctrine. He suffered martyrdom 2d Aug. 257, in the persecution of Valentinian.

STEPHEN II. a Roman, succeeded to the papal chair 752, after another pontiff of the same name, who lived only three days after his election. He was attacked by Astolphus king of Lombardy, who seized Ravenna, and threatened Rome, and in his distress he applied for assistance to Constantine Copronymus, emperor of the East, who being engaged in a war with Armenia, nia, recommended his fortunes to Pepin king of France. Pepin thus reconciled to the pope, whom before he had offended, marched into Italy, defeated Astolphus, and stripping him of the exarchate of Ravenna, and 22 other towns, he bestowed them on the holy see, and thus laid the foundation of the temporal power of Rome. Stephen died 26th April, 757.

STEPHEN III. a native of Rome, succeeded to the vacant chair, 768. He tore out the eyes of Constantine, who had usurped the chair before him, and died 772.

STEPHEN IV. a Roman, elected pope after Leo III. 816. He again consecrated Louis the Debonair king of France, and died 25th Jan. 817.

STEPHEN V. pope after Adrian III. 885, died after a weak reign, 891.

STEPHEN VI. was elected in the room of the Antipope Boniface VI. 896. He rendered himself ridiculous and unpopular by causing the body of his predecessor Formosus to be dug up, and to be tried in his pontifical robes, and to have the head severed from the body because he had been his enemy. This barbarous conduct revolted the affection of the Romans, who rose against their pontiff, and at last strangled him in prison, 897.

STEPHEN VII. successor to Leo VI. died 933, after sitting in the papal chair two years.

STEPHEN VIII. a German raised to the holy see after Leo VII. 939. He was insulted and his face disfigured by the rebellious Romans, and died 942.

STEPHEN IX. brother of Godfrey, duke of Lorraine, was elected pope 1057, after the death of Victor, and died the next year 29th March, at Florence.

STEPHEN, of Muret, Saint, son of the count de Thiers in Auvergne, devoted himself to a religious solitude, and passed the last 50 years of his life on the mountains of Muret, where he founded a monastery. He died 1124, aged 78.

STEPHEN I. St. king of Hungary after the death of his father Geisa 997, labored earnestly to reform the barbarous manners of his people. After defeating some insurgents who opposed his measures, he introduced christianity into the country, and divided the kingdom into 11 bishoprics. He confirmed the wholesome measures which he had adopted by a wise code of laws in 55 chapters, and he died much and deservedly regretted by the affection of his subjects, at Breda 1038. He was ably seconded in his pious and benevolent labors by the co-operation of his virtuous queen Gisela.

STEPHEN, of Byzantium, a grammarian of the 5th century, author of a Geographical Dictionary, inaccurately abridged by Hermolaus in the reign of Justinian, and published by Gronovius, fol. 1694, Leyden, in Greek and Latin, with the learned notes of Berkelius.

STEPHEN, a waiwode of Moldavia, in the 16th century. He expelled the lawful sovereign of Moldavia, and was at last, in consequence of his tyranny, murdered in his tent with 2000 of his attendants, by the indignant Boyard.

STEPHEN, king of England, was third son of Stephen earl of Blois, by Adela the Conqueror's daughter, and was born 1105. By well concerted measures he seized the English crown 1135, and thus in her absence dispossessed the lawful sovereign, Matilda the daughter of Henry I. who was wife of Henry IV. emperor of Germany. This usurpation was soon repented, Matilda landed with an army, 1139, and Stephen was defeated two years after at the battle of Lincoln, and taken prisoner. He was exchanged for Robert earl of Gloucester, the illegitimate brother of the empress, and on his liberation he managed his affairs that he at last triumphed over all opposition, and Matilda, unpopular on account of her pride, and supercilious conduct to the barons, left the kingdom 1147. Stephen, however, was not long to enjoy peace, and he found a new and powerful competitor in Henry, the son of Matilda, by her former marriage with Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou. The kingdom was for a while distracted by civil war, till at last wiser sentiments prevailed, and an agreement was made between the two rivals 1153, by which it was stipulated that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and that at his death, to the exclusion of his son, it should descend to Henry. Stephen died the following year and Henry peacefully ascended the throne.

STEPHENS, Henry, a celebrated printer, the founder of the family of that name, born at Paris. Of the many valuable books which he printed, the best known is a Psalter, in five columns, published 1509. He died at Lyons, 1520, and his widow married Colinaeus, a printer also of reputation, who continued the business of the family till his death 1547. His three sons were men of extraordinary talents.

STEPHENS, Robert, second son of the preceding, was born at Paris 1503. After receiving a good education he was admitted into the printing office of his father-in-law, Colinaeus, and in 1522 published for himself a New Latin Testament, which proved very offensive to the Paris divines. He set up for himself and married soon after the daughter of Badius, the printer, a woman who was well versed in Latin, and could thus converse with the learned correctors of the press whom he kept in his house. His great Latin Bible appeared in 1532, and the clamors raised against him 10 years before were now repeated by the doctors of the Sorbonne, because he had printed the notes of Calvin to his work. Though protected by Francis I. who had appointed him his printer, he found the virulence of his enemies particularly pointed against him, and after the king's death in 1547, he left Paris and retired to Geneva, carrying with him, it is said, the types, and moulds of the royal press. He died at Geneva, 1559. In his business he was most exact and particular, he undertook the printing of none but good books, and so solicitous was he of correctness, that he exposed the sheets to public view, and promised a reward to such as could discover errors. His mark was a tree branched, and a man looking upon it, with the words noli altum sapere, to which he added sometimes sed time. His Hebrew Bible, 8 vols. 16mo. 1544, and his Greek Testament, 2 vols. 16mo. 1546, called mirificam, from the first word of the preface, are much admired. He was not only a good printer, but a learned man, the friend friend of Calvin, Beza, Rivet, and others, and his Theſaurus Lingue Latinæ, 4 vols. fol. is an astonishing monument of his labor and erudition. He wrote also an Answer to the Censures of the Sorbonne Doctors to his bible. He had three sons, Henry, Robert, and Francis, and one daughter. He had also two brothers Francis and Charles; Francis worked with Colinæus, and died at Paris 1550, and Charles, the youngest of the family, wrote several valuable books. He went into Germany, with Lazarus de Baif, and was tutor to his son. He afterwards studied medicine at Paris, and took his degrees, but he, however, continued the profession of his family, and was appointed printer to the king. He died at Paris 1564, leaving only one daughter, who was very learned. He wrote more than 30 works on various subjects, of which were an Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary — de Vasculis, 8vo. — de Re Rusticâ, 2 vols. 8vo.

STEPHENS, Henry, son of Robert, just mentioned, was born at Paris, 1528. He was well educated, and considered as the most learned of his learned family, and the best Grecian of his time, after the death of Budæus. Before he applied himself assiduously to his father's business, he travelled into Italy, and afterwards visited Flanders, and England. Though his father left Paris for Geneva, he still continued in France and settled there, and then devoted himself to the correct printing of the Greek classics, and other valuable authors, of which he gave most elegant and learned editions. He was liberally patronized by Henry III. and sent by him to Switzerland to make a collection of manuscripts, but the troubles which agitated the last years of that monarch's reign, extended to Stephens, who followed his father's example, and retired to Geneva. Stephens paid great attention, and expended large sums for the completion of a Greek Theſaurus, but when he expected his labors to be rewarded, he found that Scapula the printer, whom he confidentially employed, had dishonorably taken a copy of his papers, and offered to the world a Lexicon under his name, which was in some degree well received, and thus robbed the real author of the merit of his performance. This infamous conduct, though it did not lessen the reputation of Stephens, was, however, the cause of his ruin, the money he had spent in the collection was irrecoverably lost, as the Theſaurus did not sell, and the last years of his life were passed in poverty and distress. He died in an hospital at Lyons 1598, leaving a son Paul, and two daughters, one of whom had married Isaac Casaubon. Besides the Theſaurus, a most valuable work, he wrote Introduction & l'Apologie pour Herodote, 3 vols. 8vo. a popular performance which severely reflected on the papists — de Origine Mendorum — a version of Anacreon in Latin verses — Juris Civilis Fontes & Rivi, &c.

STEPHENS, Paul, son of Henry, was very learned, though inferior to his father. He continued his father's business at Geneva, but did not exhibit the same correctness and accuracy. He died at Geneva, 1627, aged 60, leaving a son Anthony, the last printer of the family. Anthony turned Roman catholic, and left Geneva for Paris; but though he was for some time printer to the king, his inattention and prodigality proved his ruin, and he was supported for the last years of his life in an hospital, where he died 1674, aged 80. With him expired the glory of a family which, for five generations, had laboriously contributed to the advancement of literature.

STEPHENS, Robert, an eminent antiquary, born at Eastington, Gloucestershire, and educated at Wotton school, from which he removed in 1681 to Lincoln college, Oxford. He afterwards entered at the Middle Temple; but as his fortune was easy, and his fondness for polite literature very great, he did not apply much to the study of the law. He was for some time solicitor of the customs, by the influence of his relation Harley, earl of Oxford, and afterwards historiographer royal. He published lord Bacon's letters, with curious notes, and prepared materials for an history of James I. which he did not execute. He died at Gravesend, Gloucestershire, 9th Nov. 1732.

STEPHENS, John, an Englishman, educated at Douay, in the Romish persuasion. He espoused the fortunes of the exiled James II. and was captain in the army which invaded Ireland. After an act of amnesty had passed, he returned to London, and commenced writer. Among other valuable works he published a continuation of Dugdale's Monasticon — and a Dictionary, English and Spanish, folio, &c. He died about 1726.

STEPNEY, George, an English poet and statesman, born in London, 1663. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he formed an intimacy with Charles Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, which proved the source of all his future honors. Though he had paid his court to James II. he warmly embraced the principles of the revolution, and was employed as envoy to various courts in Germany, and though his abilities were not of a superior cast, he was very successful in his embassies. He was one of the commissioners of trade, and died at Chelsea, 1707, and was buried in Westminster abbey, where a pompous inscription marks the place of his remains. He is ranked among the minor poets, and besides some parts of Juvenal, he wrote some short pieces, "where," says Johnson, "a happy line may now and then perhaps be found, though there is neither the grace of wit, nor the vigor of nature."

STERNE, Laurence, an eminent writer, descended from Sterne, archbishop of York. He was born at Clomwell in the south of Ireland, 24th Nov. 1713, where his father, an officer in the army, was then stationed; and after being nine years at school, at Halifax, Yorkshire, he entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. By means of his uncle, who was prebendary of York, he obtained the living of Sutton, and afterwards a prebend in York cathedral, and by the interest of his wife he added Stillington living to his other preferments. In 1760 he came to London to commence author, and in 1762 he travelled to France, and afterwards to Italy for the recovery of his health; but a consumption on the lungs could not be removed by change either of air or of occupation. He died 1768, in London, and was buried in St. George's burial rial ground, Hanover square, and Garrick, his friend, penned these four elegant lines for his epitaph :

Shall pride a heap of sculptured marble raise,
Some worthless, unmourned, titled fool to praise;
And shall we not by one poor grave-stone learn,

Where genius, wit, and humor, sleep with Sterne?
The works of Sterne consist of "the Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy," a sentimental romance, remarkable for its eccentricity, and for an interesting delineation of characters, but not without occasional obscenity — a Sentimental Journey — sermons — letters, published since his death. He is accused of plagiarism by Ferriar, who discovers several striking parallel passages in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, bishop Hall's works, and other ancient books.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, an English poet, born in Hampshire according to Wood, and educated at Winchester school and Oxford, which he left without a degree. He was groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and had 100 marks left him by that king's will, and he continued in the same office with his successor. In his principles he was a rigid reformer, and was so highly offended at the obscene songs which were then in vogue, that he turned into English metre 51 of David's Psalms for the use of the courtiers, instead of lascivious sonnets. These were gradually introduced into parochial churches, and are still in repute, though the more elegant version of Tate and Brady, and that of Merrick, recommend themselves more powerfully to the attention of the musical ear. Of the rest of the Psalms, 58 were translated by Hopkins, a contemporary poet, and the remainder by Norton and other hands. No other composition of his is now extant. He died in London, 1549.

STESICHRUS, a Sicilian poet, distinguished also as a statesman. He died at Catana in Sicily, at the age of 80. His compositions have perished.

STEVENS, George Alexander, a native of London. He was brought up to a mechanical profession, but quitted it for the stage. The life of a theatrical hero, however, did not produce him popularity or fame, and he had recourse to a different mode of support. For several years he travelled over the kingdom, and even extended his excursions to America, lecturing on heads, in a style amusing and facetious, but often verging to licentiousness and sarcastic ribaldry; and having thus gained a comfortable income, he disposed of his lectures and of his heads to Lee Lewis. This eccentric character died at last in a mad-house, 1784. He was author of Tom Fool, a novel, 2 vols. 12mo. — some farces — songs, &c. — besides the Dramatic History of master Edwards, in which he censured and ridiculed his old friend and companion Shuter.

STEVENS, Alexander, an architect of great merit, who died 1796, in a good old age. The bridge over the Liffey in Dublin, the aqueduct over the Lune at Lancaster, and the locks in the grand canal of Ireland, are, among many other public works, lasting and honorable monuments of his skill, perseverance, and ingenuity.

STEVENS, William Bagshaw, a native of Abingdon, educated at the grammar school there, and at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took the degree of D. D. He became usher, and afterwards master, of Repton school, Derbyshire, and by the patronage of the Harpur family, he was presented to the rectory of Seckindon, Warwickshire, and the vicarage of Kingsbury. He died 1800, aged 45. He wrote Retirement, a poem in blank verse, 1782, 4to. — Indian Odes, 4to. — Idyls in the Topographer — and some poetical pieces in the Gentleman's Magazine, and other periodical works.

STEVENS, Palamedes, an English painter, born in London, died 1638, aged 31. He was descended from Flemish parents, and studied his art at Delft. His battles and encampments possess great boldness and beauty. His brother Anthony excelled in the representation of conversations and in portraits, and died 1680.

STEVIN, Simon, a native of Bruges, who instructed prince Maurice of Nassau in mathematics, and was made superintendant of the dykes of Holland. It is said that he invented the sailing chariots which were for some time adopted by the Dutch. He died 1635. He is author of a treatise on Statics — Geometrical Problems — Mathematical Memoirs — de Portuum investigandorum Ratione, &c. His mathematical works written in Flemish, have been translated into Latin by Snellius, 2 vols. folio.

STEWART, Sir James, a Scotch baronet, who died 1789, aged 76. He is author of an Apology of Sir Isaac Newton on Ancient Chronology — and a treatise on Political Economy, a work of great merit, and replete with much information, though written in a negligent style.

STEWART, Matthew, a native of Rothsay in the isle of Bute, who after studying under his father who was the minister of the parish, went to Glasgow university, to devote himself to theology. He afterwards studied mathematics at Edinburgh, where he succeeded his master Maclaurin in the mathematical chair. He died at Edinburgh 1785, aged 68. He was author of tracts physical, and mathematical, on the Theory of the Moon, the Distance of the Sun from the earth, &c. 1761. — Propositiones More Veterum Demonstratæ — general Theorems, published when he succeeded to the professor's chair, &c.

STIFELIUS, Michael, a protestant divine of Germany. He was born at Ellingen, and died at Jena 1567, aged 58. He wrote, in German, a treatise on Algebra — another on the Calendar, &c. He foretold that the end of the world would happen in 1553, but he lived to witness the fallacy of his calculations, and the disgrace of his prophetic knowledge.

STILLFLEET, Edward, an eminent prelate descended from an ancient Yorkshire family, and born at Cranbourn, Dorsetshire, 17th April 1635. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and by the patronage of his friend Sir Roger Burgoyne, of Wroxall, Warwickshire, he obtained in 1657 the rectory of Sutton. He in 1659 published his, Irenicum, or Weapon-Salve for the Church's Wounds, which, though written with great ability, gave offence to some of the church-men of the times, but he added afterwards a discourse to another edition of it, to conciliate the favor of all parties. His greatest work, "Origines Sacrae, or a Rational Account of Natural and Revealed Religion" appeared in 1662, and though produced by a young man only 27 years old astonished every reader for its erudition, elegance, strength, and clearness of argument. Thus recommended to public favor by his abilities, he was appointed preacher of the Rolls's chapel, and in 1665 was presented to the rectory of St. Andrew's Holborn. He afterwards gradually advanced through preferments; became lecturer to the Temple, chaplain to the king, canon of St. Paul's, prebendary of Canterbury, dean of St. Paul's, and in 1689 was raised to the see of Worcester. He died of the gout at his house, Park street Westminster, March 27th, 1699, and was buried in his cathedral, where an inscription, written by Dr. Bentley, was placed on his tomb. By his first wife, who lived few years with him, he had two daughters who died young, and a son Edward; and by his second, who died a little before him, he had seven children, of whom only two, Joseph and Anne survived him. Stillingfleet wrote besides, some controversial books against the deists, Socinians, papists, and dissenters, and he was engaged in the latter part of life with Locke, some part of whose Essay on Human Understanding, seemed to strike at the Mysteries of Revealed Religion. His works are the composition of an able scholar, deep divine, and a sound argumentative philosopher. They were collected and published altogether in 1710, in 5 vols. folio.

Church's

STILLINGFLEET, Benjamin, an eminent naturalist and poet, grandson of the bishop. His father Edward, rector of Wood-Norton, Norfolk, displeased his father by marriage, and the displeasure of the bishop proved injurious to his posterity. He died 1708, and Benjamin his only son, after being educated at Norwich school, entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, but here he was disappointed of a fellowship, by the interference of Bentley, the master, who had been his father's friend, and his grandfather's chaplain. Thus thrown upon the world he travelled through Italy, and by the friendship of lord Barrington he obtained the place of barrack-master at Kensington. He also succeeded to some property on the death of his friend Mr. Wyndham of Norfolk, with whom he had travelled abroad, and applied himself assiduously to the study of history, and botany. He died at a sadler's in Piccadilly, 15th Dec. 1771, aged 69, leaving some valuable papers behind him. He was never married, in consequence, it is said, of a severe disappointment in his youthful affections. He was buried in St. James's church. His works are "the Calendar of Flora" 1761 — Miscellaneous Travels, 8vo. — the Principles and Powers of Harmony, 4to. — Essay on Conversation 1757, a poem, and other poems in Dodsley's collection — some thoughts concerning happiness, &c.

STOBÆUS, John, author of a valuable collection of extracts from ancient poets, and philosophers, translated into Latin by Gefner, Geneva, 1608, was a learned Greek of the fifth century.

STOCK, Christian, a German orientalist, born at Canburg, 1672. He was professor at Jena, and died 1733, highly respected for learning. He wrote Disputationes de Pœnis Hebræorum Capitalibus — Clavis Linguae Sanctæ Veteris Testam. — and Novi Testamenti. &c.

STOCKADE, Nicholas de Helt, a native of Nimeguen 1614, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Ryccaert, and excelled as a portrait and historical painter.

STOFFLER, John, a native of Justingen in Swabia. He taught mathematics at Tubingen with great reputation, but he lost his good name, and the fame of superior knowledge, by terrifying Europe, in the prediction of a dreadful deluge which was to overwhelm the best part of the world 1524. He was author of various works in mathematics and astrology, and died Feb. 1531, aged 79. He had foretold that he should die by a fall, and in reaching for a book in his library, a large shelf fell upon his head, and he died a few days after.

STOFFLET, Nicholas, a native of Luneville, who for some years served in the army as a private soldier. During the French revolution he warmly espoused the cause of royalty, and assembling a band of men, of similar feelings with his own, he seized Bressuire, and maintained himself with vigor and success against the troops of the convention. Mildness effected what military art could not do, and Hoche prevailed upon this courageous chief, to lay down his arms, and to be reconciled to the existing government. Stofflet agreed to an armistice in 1795, but soon after his conduct was interpreted by the suspicious republicans, as subversive of the treaty; and as he was defenceless, he was easily seized and dragged to Angers, where he was shot, 23d Feb. 1796, in his 44th year. This active and heroic leader, who thus fell a victim to the cruelty of the convention, was during the short space of two years, present at 150 battles, where he not only displayed valor, but generally ensured the victory. He showed in his last moments the same intrepidity which had marked the whole of his life.

STONE, John, an English painter, best known as an able copier in the reigns of the two Charles. He studied under Crofts, but spent 37 years to improve himself abroad, and was well skilled in several languages. He died 24th Aug. 1653, at London.

STONE, Edmund, a self taught mathematician, son of the gardener of the duke of Argyle. Though not nurtured by education, he yet acquired by the feeble assistance of the duke's butler, and his own indefatigable industry, a most correct and extensive knowledge of arithmetic and mathematics. The duke accidentally found him, when 18 years old, reading Newton's Principia, and his grace had the good sense to give encouragement to such powers of genius, and he therefore transplanted him from obscurity, and manual labor, to a comfortable situation, where he devoted himself to study, and produced some some valuable works. He died about 1750. His works are a Mathematical Dictionary — a treatise on Fluxions — an edition of Euclid's Elements, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He is described by Ramsay as a man of the utmost modesty.

STONE, Nicholas, an able statuary under James I. and his son Charles. He was employed as chief architect in the building of the banqueting house, Whitehall, and, among other works, the gate and porch of St. Mary's church, Oxford, are beautiful specimens of his abilities. The best known of his monuments is that erected for the Bedford family, for which he received 1120*l*. He died 1647, aged 61, leaving two sons Nicholas, and Henry, also eminent in their profession. The younger of these, who died 1653, was also an excellent painter, and copied some of Vandyck's pieces with admirable effect.

STONEHOUSE, for James, a physician and divine of great eminence. He was born at Tubney in Berkshire, 1716, and after receiving his education at Winchester school, and St. John's college, Oxford, he applied himself to medical studies under the instruction of Dr. Nicholls. He afterwards travelled abroad and then settled at Coventry, from which he removed to Northampton, where his benevolence was strongly displayed in the erection of the county infirmary. Though for some years inclined to the principles of infidelity, in the defence of which he even wrote a book against revealed religion, three times edited, he gave way to better thoughts, and by reading the books of the best divines, especially Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion, he became a convert to the opinions of the English church. In proof of his sincerity, though in full and extensive practice, ensured by an experience of twenty years, he took orders and obtained the lectureship of all Saints, Bristol. He afterwards was presented to the livings of Great and Little Cheverell, in Wiltshire, where he devoted himself not only to the promotion of the spiritual comfort of his parishioners, but the composition of useful works in the cause of religion and virtue. As a preacher he was eloquent and impressive, and his discourses always carried conviction to the heart, and disposed the mind to more than the outward and barren profession of christianity. In 1791, on the extinction of the elder branch of his family, settled at Radley, Berkshire, he succeeded to the title of baronet, and died at Bristol, 1795. His works are very numerous, and all on religious subjects, and some of them have been recommended by the society for the promotion of Christian knowledge. His friendly Advice to a Patient has been frequently edited. An account of his life was prefixed by Mr. Stedman, to his letters, which were published in 1800, 12mo.

STORACE, Stephen, a musician and composer of eminence. The public have paid deserved approbation to his music for the Haunted Tower, the Siege of Belgrade, No Song no Supper, &c. and to several pieces composed for the Italian opera. This promising musician, who was so rapidly rising in reputation, and in opulence, died of a fever 1796, aged 33.

STORCK, Nicholas, a native of Saxony, who abandoned the tenets of Luther to found the sect of the anabaptists with Muncer. By the most extravagant doctrines, and by assuming the powers of a sovereign, he gained numerous adherents, and when banished from Saxony he retired to Swabia and Franconia, where his opinions were eagerly embraced by the deluded multitude. The military power was at last exerted to silence his preaching, and to disperse his followers, and after being guilty of the grossest excesses, he escaped to Poland, 1527, and afterwards settled at Munich, where his sect again raised its head, and spread its influence into Moravia. He died soon after, in the greatest poverty.

STORK, Abraham, a Dutch painter, whose sea pieces, sea ports, and other marine views were greatly admired. He died 1708. His brother was a good landscape painter, to whom the sublime views of the Rhine afforded many objects for the employment of his pencil.

STOUFFACHER, Werner, a native of the canton of Schwitz, who, in 1307, joined Furst, Melchtal, and Tell, in the destruction of Griser, the oppressive governor of the country. This small band of heroes succeeded in their attempts, and overturned the Austrian government, and restored their country to its original independence. Their names are still held in honor, and celebrated in the national songs of Switzerland, and will never fail to excite their posterity to deeds of heroism and glory.

STOW, John, an eminent English antiquary, born in Cornhill, London, about 1525. It is supposed that he was bred up to his father's business, which was that of a taylor. He removed from Cornhill to Aldgate, and then settled for the rest of his life in Lime street ward. In 1560 he began to make a collection for his Chronicle, and whatever was illustrative of the history and antiquities of the country, was the object of his indefatigable researches. These studies, however, were not productive at first of fame, much less of gain, and he would have abandoned them, had not Parker, the primate, stepped to his aid, and honorably contributed to his support and encouragement. His first work was, a "Summary of the Chronicles of England, from the coming in of Brute to his own Time," 1573, begun at the request of lord Robert Dudley, whose grandfather Edmund had, during his confinement in the Tower, laid the foundation of this work in his "Tree of the Commonwealth." Afterwards, in 1598, appeared his "Survey of London," containing the original, antiquity, &c. of that city, 4to. and in 1600 he published his "Flores Historiarum, or Annals of this Kingdom, from the the Times of the Britons to his own," dedicated to Whitgift, the primate. This last work was an enlargement of his "Summary," but even in that state was little less than an abridgment of a larger work, which he had prepared, and which his printer was afraid to undertake. In the latter part of his life, Stow was reduced to indigent circumstances; he petitioned twice the corporation of London, whose history he had by his labors elucidated; but the relief he received is unknown. He also obtained a brief from the king, to collect the benevolent contributions of of well disposed people for his support, and after thus devoting himself for upwards of 40 years, to develop the history, and to illustrate the antiquities of his country, and suffering the infirmities of old age, added to the horrors of indigence, he fell a victim to the stone-cholic, 5th April, 1605, aged about 80, and was buried in the church of St. Andrew Underhaft, where his wife erected a monument to record his name. To the high merits of an able historian, and indefatigable antiquarian, Stow united all the virtues of private life. He wrote for the public, he adhered to truth, and recorded nothing either through fear, or envy, or favor. He had transcribed many valuable MSS. the originals of which he could not obtain, and he travelled afoot to the various cathedrals, in search of authentic papers. Camden purchased some of his MSS. for which he allowed him an annuity of 8l.

STRABO, a native of Amasia, in Cappadocia, in the reign of Augustus and Tiberius, celebrated as a geographer and historian. Of his works only his valuable Geography is extant, best edited at Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1707.

STRADA, Famianus, a learned jesuit, born at Rome. He taught there rhetoric, and wrote several treatises on oratory and other subjects. His Prolusiones Academicæ—and his Historia de Bello Belgico, have been much admired for their correctness, the elegance of the language, and the purity of the style, though he has been attacked and severely censured by Scioppius, Rapin, and even Bolingbroke. He died at Rome 1649, aged 77.

STRADA, John, or STRADANUS, a Flemish painter, born at Bruges 1536. He studied in Italy, and settled at Florence, where he died 1604. His hunting pieces, and his historical pieces also selected from sacred subjects were much admired, and were thought worthy to rank with those of Salvati, Volterra, &c.

STRAETEN, N. Vander, a Dutch painter, born in 1680, who acquired celebrity by his landscapes. He travelled over Europe as a painter, and as a man of pleasure, and ruined his purse and his constitution by intemperance and debauchery, to which he fell an early victim.

STRAFFORD, Thomas Wentworth, earl of, Vid. WENTWORTH.

STRAHAN, William, a native of Edinburgh. After serving his time with a printer in his native town, he came to London, and by his assiduity soon rose to eminence in his profession. He purchased in 1770 a share of the patent place of king's printer, and in 1775 sat in parliament for Malmesbury, and in the next parliament for Wotton-Basset. Thus raised by his own merits to distinction and to opulence, he became the friend of the learned, and was ever ready to contribute to the comfort of those whose mental exertions had promoted his elevation. Among his particular friends was Dr. Johnson, and it is no small proof of his discernment and loyalty that he attempted to introduce this great philosopher into the House of Commons, though lord North, to whom it was earnestly proposed, did not finally accede to the measure. Mr. Strahan died 1785, aged 70, and left by his will the interest of 1000l. to the company of stationers, to be distributed in annuities of 5l. each to poor and infirm printers.

STRAIGHT, John, rector of Findon in Suffex, to which he was presented by Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he was fellow, was author of some poems in Doddsley's collection, much in the style of Prior. He was presented by bishop Hoadly to a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, but injured his property by turning farmer to maintain his family, and died poor about 1740, leaving a widow, and six children. His sermons, in 2 vols. 8vo. were published after his death for the benefit of his family.

STRANGE, sir Robert, an eminent engraver, born at Pomona in the Orkneys, July 14, 1721. He studied the law, but his genius pointed a different path to eminence, and his sketches and other drawings, appeared so highly finished, that he was placed by his friends under the care of Mr. R. Cooper of Edinburgh. His progress to fame was however arrested by the rebellion, he joined the pretender, and after the ruin of his affairs, he wandered for some time a fugitive in the highlands, and at last not without alarm returned to Edinburgh, and then passed to London with the intention of visiting Rome. He was at Rouen, and at Paris where he studied under Le Bas, and had the first knowledge of the dry needle, an instrument which his genius afterwards so much used and improved. In 1751 he settled in London, and began to be distinguished as an historical engraver, of which art he may be said to be the father in England. In 1760 he visited Italy, where every where he was received with respect and attention, and honorably elected member of the learned schools of Rome, Florence, and Bologna, and made professor of the royal academy of Parma, and member of the royal academy of painting at Paris. He was knighted by the king in 1787, and died of an asthma, 5th July, 1792. His works are greatly admired, and about 50 capital plates are still preserved by his family. In private life he was a most worthy and amiable man. A widow, 3 sons and one daughter survived him, and succeeded to a very comfortable independence.

STRAUCHIUS, Giles, a native of Wittemberg. He studied at Leipzig, and afterwards was appointed professor of divinity in his native town, from which he was invited to go and preside over the university of Dantzic as rector and theological professor. The disputes which then prevailed between the protestants and catholics, prevented his settlement, and soon after on his way to Hamburg, he was arrested by order of the elector of Brandenburg, on account of some improper allusions made by him in the pulpit. He was soon after released, and died 1682, aged 50. He is author of Breviarium Chronologicum, translated into English by Salt — Breviarium Historicum — Geographia Mathematica — Doctrina Astrorum Mathematica, &c.

STREATER, Robert, an English painter, eminent for his pieces in history, architecture, and perspective. At the restoration he was made serjeant painter to Charles II. and died in 1680, in consequence of being cut for the stone, aged 56. His great works are in the Theatre at Oxford — Moses and Aaron in St. Michael's church, Cornhill — The battle of the Giants and of the Gods, at sir Robert Clayton's, &c.

STREEK, Julian Van, a Flemish painter, whose works are much admired. He was happy in representing death and melancholy subjects. He died 1678, aged 46. His son Henry, excelled as an historical painter, and died 1713, aged 54.

STRIGELIUS, Vidorius, a native of Kaufbier, in Swabia, one of the first of Luther's disciples. He taught theology and logic at Leipzig, but his dispute with Francowitz, and his opposition to some of Luther's principles, rendered him unpopular, and he was deposed and imprisoned by his enemies. He was afterwards professor of morality at Heidelberg, where he died 26th June, 1569, aged 45. He wrote Notes on the Ancient and New Testament, and other works now little known.

STROBELBERGER, John Stephen, a native of Gratz, in Styria, who took his doctor's degree in medicine, at Montpellier, 1605. He became imperial physician at the baths of Carlsbad, and died 1630. He wrote Galliz Politico-Medica Descriptio, 12mo. — Historia Montpelienfis, 12mo. —

STRONG, Joseph, an English musician, who died at Carlisle, 1798. Though blind from his infancy he became an able mechanic, and constructed an organ on which he played with astonishing execution. He made all his own garments, and left a great number of figures, &c. as memorials of his extraordinary perseverance and great ingenuity.

STROZZI, Titus and Hercules, father and son, were Latin poets at Ferrara. Their works which consist of elegies and sonnets, and possess merit, were published together at Venice, 1 vol. 8vo. 1513. The father died 1502, aged 80, and the son was killed by a rival 1508.

STROZZI, Cyriaco, a learned Florentine, born 1504, and called a peripatetic philosopher, as he supported the doctrines of Aristotle, to whose eight books on politics he added a ninth, and a tenth, in Greek and Latin, and in the most able manner. He was professor of Greek and of philosophy at Florence, Bologna, and Pisa, and died 1565, aged 61. His sister Laurentia, a nun, was well skilled in the learned languages, and wrote some Latin hymns on the festivals of the church.

STROZZI, Julius, an Italian poet. He wrote Venetia ædificata, 1624 fol. an admired poem, on the origin of Venice, and also another heroic poem. He died 1636.

STROZZI, Nicholas, a native of Florence, distinguished as a poet. His Sylvæ of Parnassus, Idyls, and sonnets, all in Italian, are much admired. He wrote two tragedies, besides David of Trebizond, and Conradin, and died 1654, aged 64.

STRUDELL, Peter, a German painter, born in the Tyrol. He settled at Vienna, where he adorned the churches, and other public buildings, with his admirable paintings. He died there 1717.

STRUENSEE, Count, a physician, who by his abilities, recommended himself to the notice of the king of Denmark. He became prime minister and maintained his power by great talents in politics and in negotiation; but his imprudent partiality for the queen, Caroline Matilda, proved fatal to him. The queen mother, determined to ruin this favorite, caused by her intrigues his arrestation and that of his friend Brandt, and Struensee, falsely accused of an improper intercourse with Matilda, but guilty of treasonable practices, for the preservation of his power, was conducted to the scaffold, 26th July, 1772. The unfortunate Matilda, banished from the presence and the protection of her husband, was demanded back by her brother, the king of England, and she retired to Zell in Hanover, where she died of a broken heart, 1776.

STRUTT, Joseph, an English antiquary, author of a dictionary of Engravers, 4to. — an historical treatise on the manners and customs of antient inhabitants of England, 2 vols. 4to. translated into French by Boulard. He died 1787.

STRUVIUS, George Adam, professor of jurisprudence at Jena, and counsellor to the dukes of Saxony, was born at Magdebourg, and died 15th Dec. 1692, aged 73. He was twice married, and was father of 26 children. He wrote Syntagma Juris Feudalis, and Syntagma Juris Civilis, two works of great merit.

STRUVIUS, Burcard Gottlieb, one of the sons of the preceding was born at Weimar, and afterwards settled at Jena, where he engaged in his father's profession, and was equally esteemed. He died 1738, aged 67. He published, Antiquitatum Romanarum Syntagma, 4to. — Bibliotheca Historica Selecta, 8vo. — Syntagma Juris Publici, 4to. — Syntagma Historiæ Germaniæ, 2 vols. fol. — Historia Misenfis, 8vo. — a History of Germany, in German, — Introductio ad Notitiam Rei Literariæ, & Usus Bibliothecarum, &c.

STRUYS, John, a Dutch man, who began to travel in 1647, and visited, in three different journeys, Madagascar, Japan, the Levant, the shores of the Mediterranean, Muscovy, and Persia. He wrote an account of his travels, which were published by Glanville, Amsterdam 1681, 4to. and afterwards in 3 vols. 12mo. at Rouen, &c. He died about 1680.

STRYPE, John, a learned editor, born in London, of German parents. He was educated at Catherine hall Cambridge, and in 1669, was presented to the living of Theydon-boys, Essex, which he the same year resigned for Low Leyton. He had also a sinecure, the gift of Tenison the primate, and was lecturer of Hackney, where he died, 13th Dec. 1737, at a great age, having been in possession of his vicarage 68 years. He published the Lives of Archbishops Crammer, Grindal, Parker, and Whitgift, of Aylmer bishop of London, of sir Thomas Smith, of sir J. Cheke, and also ecclesiastical memorials, 3 vols. — Annals of the Reformation, 4 vols. folio. — the 2d. vol. of Lightfoot's works. — Stow's Survey of London.

STUART, Arabella, Vid. Seymour.

STUART, James, an eminent architect, born in London, 1713. The death of his father left him and his mother and three children in very indigent circumstances, but his genius began early to shine forth, and his abilities were successfully exerted and employed to support his orphan family by painting fans for a person in the Strand. While thus honorably engaged, he directed his attention to the acquisition of other other branches of science, and by assiduity he obtained a perfect knowledge of anatomy, geometry, painting, the mathematics, and architecture, to which he joined a tolerable acquaintance with Greek and Latin. After his mother's death, he settled his brother and sisters in a comfortable situation, and with scanty resources set out to visit the antiquities of Rome and Athens. He mostly travelled on foot, through Paris, and when he reached the capital of Italy, he was so fortunate as to form an intimacy with Mr. N. Revett, an able architect and painter. With this worthy associate he continued his journey to Athens, and there for five years, till 1755, remained laboriously employed in making drawings, and in taking the measures of the remarkable places of this venerable city. Their perseverance was supported and encouraged by the kindness of sir Jacob Bouverie and Mr. Dawkins, who were then at Athens, spectators of the magnificent remains of that classical spot. The result of their useful labors appeared in 1 vol. folio, 1762, under the title of the Antiquities of Athens, measured and delineated by I. Stuart and N. Revett. The merit of this publication recommended Stuart to the patronage of the great, he was taken into the society of Mr. Dawkins, and noticed by lords Anson and Rockingham and others, and was appointed surveyor of Greenwich Hospital. This respectable character was twice married; by his first wife, he had one son who died an infant; by the second, whom he married in his 67th year he had 4 children, the eldest of whom died of the small pox in 1787, and by his death undermined the feeble constitution of his father, who survived him but a few weeks. He died at his house in Leicester square, 2d Feb. 1788, aged 76, and was buried in St. Martin's church in the fields. Two more volumes have appeared since his death, one in 1790 published by Mr. Newton, the other in 1794 by Mr. Revell. Mr. Stuart is best known by the deserved surname of the Athenian Stuart.

STUART, Gilbert, a Scotch historian born in 1742, at Edinburgh, where his father was university professor. He was well educated and intended for the law, which however, his natural indolence made him abandon for the less laborious pursuit of elegant literature. Before the completion of his 22d year, he published his historical dissertation concerning the antiquity of the British constitution; which was so admired that the university granted him the degree of L.L.D. He afterwards published his view of Society in Europe, in its progress from rudeness to refinement, an ably written composition; but his labors did not sufficiently recommend him in his application for the law professorship of the university, and when disappointed he came to London, where he continued from 1768 to 1774, to write for the Monthly Review. In 1774 he returned to Edinburgh, but his attempts to establish there a review and magazine failed, and in 1782 he again visited London, and took a share in the political herald, and the English review. Intemperance brought on here complicated disorders, and when laboring under an attack of the jaundice and of the dropsy, he returned to Scotland by sea, and died in his father's house, 13th Aug. 1786. He published besides, Observations concerning the public law, and constitutional history of Scotland — the history of the reformation in Scotland — the history of Scotland from the reformation to Mary's death, in which he ably defends the character of that unfortunate queen, against Dr. Robertson and other writers. Though popular as an author, and intelligent as a man of letters, Stuart was entitled to little praise for the laxity of his principles, and the dissoluteness of his morals; for as Mr. Chalmers observes, he wantonly considered ingratitude as the most venial of sins.

STUBBE, Henry, a learned writer, born at Partney, Lincolnshire, 28th Feb. 1631. He was sent to Westminster-school, and Busby commended and rewarded his extraordinary abilities. In 1649 he was elected to Christ church, and distinguished himself there by his zeal and his learning. When bachelor of arts, he went and served in the parliamentary army in Scotland, and after he had been admitted to his master's degree, he was in 1657 appointed under librarian to the Bodleian. As he refused to conform to the orders of government, he was ejected from his offices and retired to Stratford on Avon to practise physic, to the study of which he had formerly applied himself. In 1661 he went to Jamaica as king's physician to the island, but soon returned in consequence of the unfavorable climate. He afterwards settled at Warwick, and then at Bath, where he acquired considerable practice. He was intimate with Hobbes, whom he supported against Dr. Wallis, and against the new establishment of the royal society, and in consequence of this controversy, in which he ably maintained the ancient doctrines of the schools of the Aristotelian philosophy, he made a severe attack on Mr. Glanvill, and charged him and the other members of the society, with the intention of undermining the universities, destroying the established religion, and introducing popery. His enemies, fairly however, accused him of inconsistency, as before the restoration he had abused monarchy, universities, churches, and all ancient establishments, while he defended the conduct and principles of his early friend and patron sir Henry Vane. After a life chequered with accidents and controversial quarrels, this extraordinary man was unfortunately drowned, 12th July 1676, while crossing the river two miles from Bath. The body was taken up the next morning, and when buried in the great church, Bath, a funeral sermon was preached over him, probably with little commendation, by his antagonist Glanvill the rector. As a man of erudition, of extensive information, an accomplished scholar, an able and ready disputant, Stubbe deserves the highest praise. In other respects he was strongly deficient in common discretion, wavering in his principles, occasionally rash and obstinate in his opinions, and regardless of that sobriety and that decorum in conduct, which should accompany great powers of mind. His writings are very numerous, but though they convey much information and deep research, they are distinguished for abuse, satire, and malevolence.

STUBBS, George, an able writer, rector of Gunville, Dorsetshire, and known as the author of some of the best papers of the Free Thinker, with Ambrose Philips and others, 1718. He wrote also the "new adventure of Telemachus", 8vo, an admired performance, founded on principles of liberty, and in opposition to Fenelon's work. He wrote besides some elegant verses, which are still preserved in MS. by his friends. He was twice married. The time of his death is not mentioned.

STUBBS, George, a native of Liverpool, distinguished as a painter and anatomist. At the age of 30 he visited Rome, to improve himself in the study and knowledge of the arts and the monuments of the ancients, and on his return he devoted himself laboriously to the completion of his valuable work, the anatomy of the horse, including a particular description of the bones, cartilages, &c. with most valuable plates, published 1766. In the delineation of animals he particularly excelled, and his pieces stand very high in the public estimation. He undertook another elaborate work, a comparative anatomical exposition of the structure of the human body, with that of a tyger and common fowl, in 30 tables, of which, however, he published only three parts before his death. This excellent artist died in London, 10th July, 1806, aged 82.

STRUCKIUS, John William, a native of Zurich, distinguished as an antiquary. He wrote a treatise on the Feasts of the Antients and their Sacrifices, a learned work in fol. — a Commentary on Adrian — a treatise called Carolus Magnus Redivivus, 4to. in which he compares Henry IV. of France with Charlemagne. He died 1607.

STRUDLY, John, an English poet, educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He followed the profession of arms, and served under prince Maurice at the siege of Breda, where he was killed 1587. Among other things he translated several of Seneca's tragedies.

STURKELEY, William, a celebrated antiquary, born at Holbeck, Lincolnshire, 7th Nov. 1687. After receiving his education in the school of his native town, he was, in 1703, admitted of Benet college, Cambridge, where he studied physic and botany with great assiduity. When he had taken his degrees of bachelor in medicine, he settled at Boston, and in 1717 removed to London, where he was soon after, at the recommendation of his friend Dr. Mead, elected fellow of the Royal society, and also one of the first members of the antiquarian society. He left London in 1726 to settle at Grantham, in his native county, where his abilities were called into action by his attendance on the noblest, and most respectable families of that neighbourhood. He found himself, however, so much afflicted with the gout that he determined to abandon his laborious profession, for the church preferment, which his powerful friends could command for him, and after being ordained by Wake, the primate, in 1730 he was presented to the living of All-Saints, Stamford. In 1739 he obtained from the duke of Ancafter the living of Somerby near Grantham, and in 1747, he relinquished, at the pressing solicitation of the duke of Montague, his country preferments, for the rectory of St. George, Queen's square, London. He was seized with a stroke of the palsy, the 27th Feb. 1765, and died four days after in his 78th year. He was buried in East-Ham church-yard, Essex, without any monument. He was twice married, but had issue only by his first wife, three daughters.

The best known of his works are Itinerarium Curiosum, or an Account of the Curiosities and Antiquities in Great Britain, folio, with copper plates — Palæographia Sacra, or Discourses on the Monuments of Antiquity, that relate to Sacred History, 4to. — Palæographia Britannica, 4to. — an Account of Stonehenge and Abury, folio. — History of Carausius, 2 vols. 4to. — Dissertation on the Spleen, fol. — a treatise on the Gout, besides other valuable tracts on antiquities, &c. His knowledge of druidical history was so extensive that he was not improperly called by his friends the arch-druid of his age. He was the correspondent and the friend of the most learned and respectable persons of his time.

STUNICA, James Lopez, a Spanish divine and philosopher, in the university of Alcalá. Besides an account of his journey to Rome from Alcalá, called "Itinerarium, dum Compluto Romam Proficisceretur," he wrote against Erasmus, and against James le Fevre's notes on St. Paul's epistles. He died at Naples, 1530.

STURMIUS, James, a learned German, born at Strasburg 1489. His abilities were employed in several embassies to the diets of the empire, to England and the imperial court, and he contributed greatly by his influence to the reformation at Strasburg, and also to the erection of a college there. He assisted Sleidan in the compilation of the History of the Reformation in Germany, which was honorably acknowledged by the author, and died at Strasburg, 30th Oct. 1553.

STURMIUS, Leonard Christopher, a native of Altorf, distinguished as an architect. He published a complete course of Architecture, Augsburg, 16 vols. — and a Translation of Bökler's Architecture, and died 1719, aged 50.

STURMIUS, John, the Cicero of Germany, was born at Sleidan, in Eifel, near Cologne 1507. He studied at Liege and Louvain, and afterwards set up a printing press with Rudger Rescius, and began the printing of the Greek classics. In 1529, he was at Paris where he read lectures on Greek and Latin writers, and logic, and then retired to Strasburg in 1537, as he was afraid of the persecution which might attend his attachment to the protestant principles. He settled at Strasburg, which now obtained the title of an university, and he was appointed rector, and saw his pupils numerous and respectable. When pressed on account of his principles he declared himself a Calvinist, and in consequence was deprived of his rectorship. He died 3d March, 1589, aged about 80. He was three times married, but left no children. He published various books, among which were valuable notes on Aristotle's Rhetoric, and other authors, besides, a tract called Linguae Latinae resolvendæ Ratio, 8vo.

STURMIUS, John Christopher, professor of philosophy and mathematics at Altorf where he died 1703, aged 68, was a native of Hippolstein. He published a German translation of the works of Archimedes — Collegium Experimentale Curiosum, 4to. — Physica Electiva & Hypothesica, 2 vols. 4to. — Scientia Cosmica, folio. — a Course of Mathematics, translated into to English, 3 vols. 8vo. — Mathesis Juvenilis, 2 vols. 8vo. — Physicæ Conciliatricis Conamina, 12mo. — Prælectiones contra Astrologiæ Divinatricis Vanitatem, 2 vols. 4to. — Physicæ Modernæ Compendium, &c.

STUVEL, Ernest, a painter born at Hamburgh. His prints and flowers were highly admired. He died 1712, aged 45.

SUAREZ, Francis, a Spanish jesuit, born at Granada, 5th Jan. 1548. He was professor at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Rome, and afterwards was invited to Coimbra in Portugal, where he became professor of divinity. He died at Lisbon, 1617, with a great character for piety. He wrote on metaphysics, morality, and theology, and his works amounted to 23 vols. fol. and so extraordinary was his memory that on quoting any passage from his works, he could continue the quotation to the end of the page. His treatise "de Legibus" was an able performance.

SUBLEYRAS, Peter, a French painter whose portraits and historical pieces were much esteemed. He was a native of Languedoc, and died 1759, aged 60.

SUTTERMANS, Justus, a native of Antwerp, celebrated as a painter. His most admired piece preserved at Florence, represents the Florentines paying their homage to Ferdinand II. He died 1681, aged 84.

SUCKLING, for John, an English poet, born at Wingham, Essex, 1613. His abilities were early displayed, so that he could speak Latin at five, and write it at nine. When his education was completed he went on his travels, and studied the manners, and character of foreign nations, without imitating their vices. He was prevailed upon to attend one of the campaigns of Gustavus Adolphus, and was present at three battles, and five sieges, and on his return, as a proof of his patriotism, and military spirit, he raised at his own expence of above 12,000l. a troop of horse, for the king's service. This troop was more remarkable for finery, than valor, so that it is said for John took much to heart their ill conduct against the Scots, and fell a victim to a fever, in his 28th year, 1641. He wrote besides, a few poems, and some letters — an Account of Religion by Reason — a Discourse, upon occasion presented to lord Dorset, and four plays which have been edited several times, in 2 vols. 8vo.

SUE, John, a native of Cotte-St.-Pol., who studied surgery at Paris, under Devaux, and acquired great celebrity. He learned Latin at the age of 45, that he might be enabled to examine students in medicine. He was a very intelligent man, and wrote some useful medical memoirs. He died, 30th Nov. 1782.

SUE, John Joseph, brother of the above, came to Paris, in 1729, and studied under the celebrated anatomist Verdier, whom he succeeded in the professorial chair. He died at Paris, 10th Dec. 1792, aged 82. His works are, an Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo. — treatise on Bandages, 12mo. — Elements of Surgery, 8vo. — Anthropotomia, or the Art of Injecting, Dissecting, and Embalming, 8vo. — Osteology, translated from the English of Dr. Munro, 2 vols. fol. with 31 plates, besides memoirs in the collection of the Savans Etrangers, &c.

SUETONIUS, Gaius Tranquillus, a Roman biographer, and historian, secretary to Adrian, and the friend of Pliny. Of all his works, only his lives of the 12 first Cæsars, and his treatise of Illustrious Grammarians is preserved, best edited by Ernesti, 1775, 8vo.

SUEUR, Nicholas le, or SUDORIUS, counsellor, and president of the parliament of Paris, was assassinated by some robbers in the night, 1594, aged 55. He published an elegant translation of Pindar, in Latin verse, 1582, 8vo. — republished at Oxford by Prideaux, 1697, in fol.

SUEUR, Thomas le, of the order of Minims, was born at Rethel, in Champagne, 1703, and taught with great applause, theology, philosophy, and mathematics at Rome. He assisted in the education of the infant duke of Parma, and died at Rome, 22d Sept. 1770. He was deservedly patronized by the popes, and from his long, and faithful intimacy with father Jacquier, arose the composition of a learned commentary on Newton's Principia — a treatise on the Integral Calculus, 2 vols. 4to. — Institutiones Philosophiæ, 5 vols. 12mo.

SUEUR, Eustache le, a French painter, born at Paris. He studied under Simon Vouet, and though never out of France, he acquired great celebrity, and carried his art to the highest perfection, on models of antiquity, and after the best Italian masters. He died at Paris, 30th April, 1655, aged 38. His works are preserved at Paris, the most admired of which, is the life of St. Bruno, in the Carthusian cloisters, at Paris.

SUFFREN, John, a native of Salon, in Provence, who became an active member of the jesuits' society, and was confessor to Mary de Medicis. During the disputes, between this prince and her son Lewis XIII. he attempted to produce a reconciliation but without effect, and by the intrigues of Richelieu, he was banished from the court, and died at Flushing, 1641, aged 70. He wrote Année Chretienne, 4 vols. 4to. a work of merit, abridged by Frizon in 2 vols. 12mo. Admiral Suffren, who distinguished himself in the East Indies against the English is supposed to be of the same family, as he was born in Provence. This gallant officer was highly honored by the French king for his services, and died 1789.

SUGER, Abbé, minister under Lewis VII. and Lewis the Grös, was born at Touri in Beauce, 1082. He was made abbot of St. Denis, where he died 1152. This epitaph was placed on his tomb. Cy git l'Abbé Suger. He was of superior talents, and of unshaken integrity. His life has been written in 3 vols. 12mo. by Gervaise a Dominican.

SUIZER, John Gaspard, a learned German, born at Zurich 1620. He was there professor of Greek and Hebrew, and died at Heidelberg, 1705. His Lexicon, "five Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus Patrum Græcorum" best edited 2 vols. fol. 1728, Amsterdam, is an useful work. His son Henry, was also an able professor at Zurich, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died 1705. His Chronology of Switzerland, in Latin, is much esteemed among his other learned works.

SUIDAS, the author of a valuable Greek Lexicon, containing much historical, and geographical information, is supposed to have lived in the age of Alexis Comnenus. The best edition is by Kuster, 1705, 3 vols. fol. Cambridge.

SULIVAN, fr Richard Joseph, an English writer. He went early in life to the East Indies, and after his return to England, he published an account of his tour through various parts of the kingdom, 2 vols. 8vo. He afterwards published a letter to the East India Directors — Analysis of the Political History of India — Thoughts on Martial Law — Philosophical Rapfodies, &c. — a View of Nature, in Letters to a Traveller among the Alps, a work of little merit, though commended by the author of the Pursuits of Literature. In 1790, he obtained a seat in parliament and continued member of the house of commons till his death. He was created a baronet in 1804, and died at Thames-Ditton, Surrey, 17th July, 1806.

SULLY, Maximilian de Bethune, baron of Rosni, duke of, celebrated as the friend and minister of Henry IV. was born of an illustrious family at Rosni, 1559. At the age of 11 he was presented to the queen of Navarre, and educated with her son, afterwards Henry IV. of France. He accompanied him to Paris, but must have perished in the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew, if not humanely concealed for three days by the principal of the college of Burgundy. Attached by affection to the young king, Sully distinguished himself in the various campaigns in which he was engaged, and at Marmande, Cahors, Coutras, Fosseuse, Arques, Gisors, Dreux, and Ivry, his character as an able, active, and intrepid warrior, was nobly established. But he was born to shine not only in the field, but in the cabinet. Before his master ascended the French throne, he was his envoy at the court of Paris, and by his negotiations with the Swiss in 1586, he obtained a subsidy of 20,000 men. In 1599 he negotiated the marriage of Henry with Mary de Medicis, and in his embassy at the court of Elizabeth, he displayed the most consummate prudence, and after the decease of that princess, he had the address to settle the wavering mind of James in favor of his master. Raised to the office of prime minister he exerted himself for the prosperity of the kingdom, as well as the splendor of the monarchy. The taxes were collected with ease and without oppression to the subject and all impositions were abolished. Though often thwarted in his views, by the intrigues of the courtiers, and of the mistresses of the monarch, he remained firm to his principles, distinguished more as the zealous friend than as the temporizing minister of Henry. Regular in the affairs of his office he rose every morning at 4, and after devoting some time to business, he gave audience to such as solicited an admission to him, and never rejected the meanest person from his presence. Always attentive to the interests of the kingdom, he prevailed upon his master to change his religion, and to become a catholic to please his catholic subjects of France, but when solicited also to abandon the protestant tenets, he firmly refused, and replied to the pope, who in flattering him, upon the greatness of his abilities as minister, artfully pressed him to enter upon the right way, "I never shall cease to pray for the conversion of your holiness". After the murder of Henry, he was disgraced from the court, and when recalled some years after by Lewis XIII. he recommended the banishment of all the buffoons, and the flatterers, who amused, and ruined the effeminate monarch. Sully died at his seat of Villebon in Pays Chartrain, 21st Dec. 1641, aged 82. The memoirs which he composed in his retreat, and which he called Economies Royales, have been published, and contain a very minute detail of the history of the court, not only during his ministry, but during the reign of Charles IX. of Henry III. and Henry IV. This work has been pruned of its obsolete terms by de l'Ecluse, and published in 3 vols 4to. and in 8 vols 12mo. 1745.

SULPICIA, a Roman lady, called the Roman Sappho, in Domitian's reign. Her poem against the emperor is still preserved.

SULPICIUS, Severus, an ecclesiastical writer, born in Aquitaine, in the fifth century. He wrote the Life of Martin of Tours — Ecclesiastical History, edited by Le Clerc, 1709, 8vo.

SULZER, John George, an eminent philosopher, born at Winterthurn, in the canton of Zurich, Oct. 1720, the youngest of 25 children. His abilities slowly unfolded themselves; at 16 he had no taste for study, till at last a perusal of Wolfe's Metaphysics roused his attention, and called into action all his powers of thought. He became an ecclesiastic, and was the friend of Maupertuis, Euler, and Sack, and in 1747, he was invited to fill the mathematical chair at Berlin, where he died Feb. 1779, universally respected for modesty, learning, benevolence, and all the milder virtues. His works are numerous, the best known of which are, Moral Contemplations on the Works of Nature — treatise on Education — Universal Theory of the Fine Arts, 2 vols. 4to. — Remarks on Hume's Essays, &c.

SUMOROKOF, Alexander, the founder of the Russian theatre, was born at Moscow, 14th Nov. 1727. He was educated at home, and then removed to the seminary for cadets, at Petersburg, where he studied with uncommon assiduity. He was recommended by count Shuvalof to the empress Elizabeth, and at the age of 29 he began to study the plays of Racine, and soon produced his first piece, "Koref," which was acted in private, and then before the court, and received with the most unbounded applause. The public favor animated his muse, and he successively wrote Hamlet, Aristona, Sinaf and Truvor, Zemira, Dimisa, and other tragedies; besides comedies, and 2 operas, sonnets, elegies, fables, satires, odes, &c. except epic poetry. Thus supported by national applause, he was not unrewarded by the court; Elizabeth raised him to the rank of brigadier, and made him director of the Russian theatre, with a pension of 400l. and Catherine appointed him counsellor of state, and knight of St. Anne. He died universally respected, 1st Oct. 1777. His tragedies possess great merit; but there are some blemishes in them, and in his comedies he displayed much humor, though he sacrifices too much to vulgarity, while he attempts to excite the laughter of his auditors. His satires are the best in the Rufian language, but are very unequal. In his elegies he shows great powers of tenderness and animation, and in his idyls, the most pleasing simplicity. He is deservedly regarded with Lomonoſof as the honor of the nation; and while he displayed all the softness, the graces, and the harmony of the poetry, his illustrious countryman soared to the regions of sublimity and majestic strength. He wrote also some short historical pieces, in a style clear and elegant, but perhaps too flowery.

SUPERVILLE, Daniel de, a native of Saumur, in Anjou, who studied at Geneva, and became a protestant minister at the Walloon church of Rotterdam. He died at Rotterdam, 9th June, 1728, aged 71. He wrote, the Duties of the Afflicted Church, 8vo. — sermons, of which a seventh edition appeared 1726 — the Truths and the Duties of Religion, &c.

SURENHUSIUS, William, a learned professor of Hebrew at Amsterdam in the 18th century. He is known by his valuable edition of the Mischna of the Jews, with notes, and the Commentaries of Maimonides and Bartenora, published 1703, 3 vols. folio.

SURIAN, John Baptist, a native of St. Chamas, in Provence, who became bishop of Vence, and died 3d Aug. 1754, aged 84. He was a pious and benevolent prelate, an amiable man, and an eloquent preacher. Some of his sermons have been published, of which the best known is that on the small number of the elect.

SURIUS, Lawrence, a native of Lubeck, who studied at Cologne, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession. He died at Cologne, 1578, aged 56. He wrote some theological tracts, now little read.

SURVILLE, Margaret Eleanor Clotilde de, a French poetess, who celebrated the heroic deeds of her countrymen, and died at a great age at the close of the 15th century. Her language is almost obsolete; but she possessed great vigor of mind, and a fertile imagination. Her poems were published at Paris in 1803, prepared for the press by one of her descendants, Joseph Stephen de Surville, an officer of merit, who, after distinguishing himself in the wars of Corsica and America, fell a victim to the French revolution, and was shot at Puyen-Velay, 1799.

SUTCLIFFE, Matthew, a learned divine, known for his controversial works, — a treatise of Ecclesiastical Discipline, 4to. 1591 — De Presbyterio, 4to. — De Turco-Papismo, or the Resemblance between Mahometanism and Popery, 4to. — De Purgatorio — De Verâ Christi Ecclesiâ, 4to. 1600 — De Missâ. He was dean of Exeter, and founder of Chelsea college, and died about 1610.

SUTTON, Thomas, founder of the Charter-house, was born at Knaith, in Lincolnshire, 1532. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, as is supposed, and then studied the law at Lincoln's Inn, but he had no inclination for that profession, and therefore travelled over Holland, France, Spain, and Italy. At his return he became secretary to the earls of Warwick and Leicester, and distinguished himself in the north of England, in the service of Elizabeth. He purchased some estates in the county of Durham, which were found to contain coal mines, and thus produced him an immense income. His property was farther increased by marrying a rich widow, and by engaging in commerce, and with such success that he is said to have had 30 agents abroad, and to have prevented, for one year, the armament of Philip against England, by draining the bank of Genoa, of the money, which was intended for that monarch's use. With money and patriotism he possessed courage, and one of his ships, called Sutton, was distinguished among the fleet which defeated the Spanish Armada. After living with great splendor, he retired to private life and solitude, after the death of his wife, 1602, and he determined to render his name immortal by some spirited foundation, though the court tempted him with the honors of a peerage, to divert him from his purpose, and to induce him to make the duke of York, Charles I. his heir. In consequence of this resolution he bought the dissolved Charter-house for 13,000l. and founded there a noble hospital, and public school. He died 11th Dec. 1611, at Hackney, aged 79, and his remains were deposited in Christ church, London, till removed, in 1614, to a vault in his newly erected hospital. His property, at his death was 5000l. a-year in land, and above 60,000l. in money, an immense fortune in those times.

SUTTON, Samuel, a native of Alfreton, Derbyshire. After serving in the army under Marlborough, he kept a coffee-house in Aldergate street, and having strong natural powers as a mechanic, he applied them to various useful projects. His plan, in 1740, of clearing the foul air from the wells of ships, by opening a communication with the fire-places by means of pipes, though recommended by Dr. Mead, was superseded by the more simple invention of ventilators, introduced by Dr. Hales. He died in 1752.

SUWARROFF, Alexander, a Russian general, born of an ancient family, 1730. His father intended him for the magistracy; but the future general preferred the military service of his country, and in 1742 he entered into the army as a common soldier, and by a gradual rise he, in 1762, was made a colonel. After some campaigns in Poland, he went under the celebrated Romanzoff against the Turks, and behaved with such personal bravery, that he killed with his own hand, several of the Janissaries, and as a proof of victory, threw their heads into a sack, and emptied the contents at the feet of his general. He next crossed the Danube, near Silistria, and joining Kamaskoy, he defeated the 40,000 men commanded by the Reis-Effendi, and took all his artillery. In 1783 he obliged the Tartars of Kuban and Budziack to submit to the power of Russia, and to take the oath of allegiance, for which the empress nominated him general in chief. In 1787 he bravely defended Kinburn against the Ottoman fleet, and cut to pieces the Janissaries who had been landed. In 1789, after defeating the enemy at Fockan, he flew, at the head of 10,000 men, to the relief of the prince of Saxe Coburg, who, with the imperial troops, was surrounded by 100,000 Turks, and he obtained so signal a victory, that his services were rewarded with the title of a count of the Roman empire.

pire, under the name of Riminiski, in commemoration of the river Riminisk, near which the battle had been fought. Soon after he was sent by Potemkin against the town of Ismailow, which had already resisted its assailants for seven months, and he was ordered to take it in three days, and on the third day the town submitted, after the dreadful slaughter of 40,000 Turks, who refused to give or take quarter. The treaty of Yassy put an end to the war with the Ottomans; but Suwarroff found in Poland a new field of glory. He attacked Prague, and made himself master of Warsaw, after cutting to pieces 20,000 of the Poles who opposed his progress, and for this bold conduct, and his successful campaign, which thus enabled three neighbouring powers to parcel out among themselves the Polish dominions, the conqueror was raised to the rank of field marshal, and rewarded with large domains. In 1799 the general was sent to command the Russian forces in Italy, and to check the career of the French triumphs. After a glorious campaign, in which he restored the fallen fortunes of the allies, he was opposed to the genius of Moreau; but notwithstanding the abilities, and the generalship of his enemy, he maintained his superiority, and though obliged at last to give way, his retreat through the snows of Switzerland, to the borders of Germany, displayed the most masterly manoeuvres. Another campaign would have opened the way to fresh victories, but Paul capriciously changed his politics, and the general, displeased with the want of co-operation on the part of the Germans, retired to Russia. Though honorably received at Peterburg, and created prince Italisky, he fell under the displeasure of his ungrateful master, and died, it is said, of a broken-heart, near the capital, 1800. In his character, Suwarroff was as singular as he was bold and intrepid. He was the idol of his soldiery, and often on the field of battle, he appeared among them stripped to his shirt, and with one leg booted, and the other with only a sandal. His food was often coarse, like that of the common soldier, and he rested in the camp like his inferior associates, covered with a sheep skin. In his intercourse with the world he affected to be laconic. When he took Toutou-Kai, in Bulgaria, he sent these words to Catherine, "the town is taken, I am there," and when Ismailow fell into his hands, the empress was informed of it by this short sentence, "Madam, proud Ismailow is at your feet." He declined all political and diplomatic employments about the court, observing that the pen is unbecoming the hand of a soldier. In his religious opinions he affected great devotion, and he ordered his officers every evening to repeat a prayer in the presence of their soldiers, and he never began a battle without paying adoration to the image of St. Nicolas, which accompanied him in all his expeditions. Though brave, fortunate, and heroic, Suwarroff must be condemned for his inhumanity, for surely that general sinks below the name of man, who permits his soldiers to ravage and to murder when the prostrate enemy implores aloud for mercy.

SUZE, Henriette de Coligni, Vid. COLIGNI.

SWAMMERDAM, John, an eminent naturalist, born at Amsterdam, 1637. He imbibed his first ideas of natural history from the occupation of his father, who was an apothecary, and early began to make a collection of curiosities. He employed much time in catching and examining the flying insects of Holland, and to improve a taste so strongly marked for the examination of the works of nature, he studied at Leyden, and became the friend of Steno the celebrated anatomist, and of Van Horne, and in 1667, took his degree of M. D. He had in the mean time visited Paris and Saumur, and improved himself by the conversation and intimacy of Tanaquil Faber, and Thevenot. In 1667, he made his first experiment of injecting the uterine vessels of the human body, with ceraceous matter, which he afterwards brought to great perfection. A dreadful ague, however, interrupted his anatomical labors, which he had pursued with his friend Horne, and in consequence he determined to devote himself solely to the study of insects. In 1669, he published a general history of insects, a work of great merit, in 2 vols. fol. but though tempted by liberal offers by the grand duke of Tuscany, he refused to quit his native country, though his father was displeased with his pursuits, and insisted upon his practising physic. In 1673, he became acquainted with Madam de Bourignon, and for her mythical reveries he abandoned the pursuits of natural history, wholly devoted, as he said, in adoring and loving the sovereign good. He continued thus lost to himself and to the world, and died 1680. His other works are, a treatise on Respiration, 4to—de Fabricâ Uteri Muliebris, 4to. His works in Dutch, have appeared in an English translation from the Latin version of Gaubius, in folio, with 53 copper plates, 1758.

SWANEFELD, Herman, a Flemish painter, who studied under Gerard Douw and Claude Lorraine. He settled at Rome, and lived in so reclusive a manner that he was called the hermit of Italy. His landscapes, which are very scarce, possess great merit. He died 1680, aged 60.

SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, a fanatic Swede, born at Stockholm, 29th Jan. 1688. His father was a bishop of the Lutheran persuasion, and president of the Swedish churches. The son travelled abroad in 1710, and on his return was elected assessor of the Metallic college, an office which he resigned in 1747. He was well acquainted with the business of his profession, and wrote Regnum Minerale, 3 vols. fol. 1734, besides, a treatise on the Tides, and another on the position and course of the Planets. From the pursuit of philosophical objects, he at last withdrew himself to the contemplation of heavenly things, and in his opinions he became the founder of a new sect of enthusiasts, which though not numerous during his lifetime, has since his death increased rapidly on the continent and in London, where under the title of New Jerusalem Conventicles, they ensnare the superstitious and the unwary. This singular character, who in his moments of mystical reveries and enthusiastic madness, supposed that he conversed not only with angels but with the Supreme Being, pretended that whatever happens in the world, has already happened in the world of spirits, which is situated between heaven and hell. According to his declaration the final judgment took place in 1756, in this invisible world of spirits, 'spirits, and the result of it was communicated to him by the Redeemer himself. To support his doctrines he published various works, such as books on the New Jerusalem — on Heaven and Hell — Spiritual Influx — the White Horse of the Revelations, &c. This extraordinary character died in London, 29th March, 1772, aged 85. In his younger years he had shared the favors of the king of Sweden, and been ennobled in 1719.

SWIFT, Jonathan, a distinguished divine, and able writer. He was born 30th Nov. 1667, in Ireland, descended of an ancient English family. His father died about seven months before his birth, and left him with his mother and a daughter in very indigent circumstances, but the elder branches of the family provided for the maintenance of the future dean. At the age of six he went to Kilkenny school, and eight years after removed to Trinity college, Dublin. At the university he applied himself more to history and poetry, than to logic and academical learning, so that after four years' residence he was refused his first degree for insufficiency, and was at last permitted to take it speciali gratia, in terms of reproach. This circumstance roused all his attention, and for the seven next years of his life he regularly studied eight hours a day. In 1688, his uncle was attacked by a most severe illness, which deprived him of his speech and memory, and having thus lost a patron and a friend he passed into England to visit his mother, who had fixed her residence at Leicester, to consult about future means of support. Here he was introduced to sir William Temple, who had married a relation of Mrs. Swift, and in the company of this distinguished statesman he continued about two years, and had frequent opportunities of seeing king William, who once offered to make him captain of horse. Swift's thoughts, however, were bent to the church. He was admitted to his master's degree at Oxford, ad eundem, 1692, with many marks of civility, and afterwards assisted his friend sir William in revising his works; but though he enlarged his political knowledge in the conversation of his patron, he thought himself neglected, and in 1694, a quarrel and separation took place. Swift soon after obtained from Capel the lord deputy of Ireland, the prebend of Kilroot, in the diocese of Connor, worth 100*l.* a year, but in a little time returned to sir William Temple, who wished for his conversation by any sacrifice whatever; and for four years till sir William's death, the greatest harmony prevailed between them. On his friend's death he inherited a legacy from him, and the right of his posthumous works, which he dedicated to the king, in hopes of receiving some preferment which the monarch in his gayer hours had liberally promised, but he was disappointed, and soon after followed, as secretary and chaplain, lord Berkeley, one of the lords justices of Ireland. Here again disappointment followed him, he had been promised the deanery of Derry, but when it became vacant his patron gave it to some greater favorite, and presented him to the livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin, in the diocese of Meath. At Laracor he now resided, engaged in all the duties of an active and exemplary parish priest. It was in this place that he was first visited by the celebrated Stella, who was daughter of W. Johnson, steward to sir William Temple, and who inherited from him, for the faithful services of her father, a legacy of 1000*l.* This lady, whom Swift had seen at the house of his former patron, came to Ireland at his pressing invitation, and as she was but 18 she was accompanied by Mrs. Dingley, a female friend 15 years older. These two ladies lived with Swift on terms of the strictest intimacy, but without scandal; in his absence they resided at the parsonage, but on his return they removed to their lodgings in the village, and they were never known to meet but in the company of a third person. In 1701 he took his doctor's degree, and after the death of king William, he came to England occasionally, and embarked in the politics of the time. He became acquainted with Harley, and the leading members of the ministry, and gained so much their confidence, that he was consulted by them in matters of importance, and considered as capable not only of defending, but almost of guiding the public measures. Though thus courted by the great and powerful, he did not receive any preferment before 1713, when he was made dean of St. Patrick, Dublin. A bishopric had before been intended for him by the queen; but on the representation of archbishop Sharp, who declared him to be a man whose christianity was very questionable, his name was passed by. Soon after he had taken possession of his deanery, he returned to England, to attempt to reconcile Harley and St John, whose enmity seemed to threaten destruction to the whole power of the ministry, but in vain. After the death of queen Anne, he had little connection with the leading men of England; but, though for some time very unpopular in Ireland, his patriotism soon restored him to the public favor. When Wood obtained, by iniquitous means, a patent to coin 180,000*l.* in copper, for the use of Ireland, a measure which, in enriching the projector, would have ruined the people, the dean boldly opposed the plan, and by the publication of his Drapier's Letters, he prevailed upon the public to reject the use of the money. Thus successful in the suppression of this irregular patent, he became the oracle of Ireland, and nothing was adopted in commercial or political subjects, either at Dublin or in the country, without previously knowing the sentiments of the dean. The last period of his life was spent in retirement, and under the afflictions of melancholy. In 1736 he lost his memory, and as his temper was naturally irascible, he grew violent and peevish, so that few of his friends were permitted to visit him. In 1741 his infirmities were such that he was unfit for conversation, and the next year he became wild and delirious, and at times sunk into such insensibility, that for a whole year he never spoke. After short intervals of reason, he gradually declined, and at last died at the end of October 1745, aged 78, without the least pang or convulsion. He was buried in the cathedral of St. Patrick. Among the singularities of this extraordinary character, his conduct to Stella deserves the severest reprobation. After an intimate friendship of more than 16 years, he in 1716 married this amiable woman; but still no alteration took place in their mode of living, and she never resided in his house except cept when fits of giddiness or deafness made her presence necessary. He never acknowledged her as his wife, though she always presided at his table; and this cruel conduct at last broke the heart of this injured woman. Late in life he wished her to be publicly acknowledged as his wife, but hurt by his unkindness, she replied, "that it was too late, and that they must live as they had lived before," and she gradually declined in health, and died 28th Jan. 1727, in her 44th year. But not only Stella experienced the coldness and cruelty of his heart. In his excursions in England, he became acquainted with Mrs. Vanhomrigh, and her two daughters, with the eldest of whom he conversed frequently on literary and poetical subjects. From an occasional instructor, Swift soon became in the eye of the lady an object of admiration and of love, and she at last ventured to propose marriage to him. He affected to ridicule her on her choice, but without a direct and absolute refusal, he continued to indulge her hopes by the frequency of his correspondence. In 1714, this lady, who is better known under the name of Vanessa, passed into Ireland with her sister, and fixed her residence in his neighbourhood, and at last in 1717 she solicited him in the strongest terms not to trifle with her affections, but to declare whether he would accept or refuse her for a wife. The dean, who had hitherto sported with the feelings of this innocent and amiable woman, wrote an answer to her letter, probably intimating his marriage with Stella, and delivered it with his own hands. Vanessa read it, and survived the shock only a few weeks; but before she expired, she altered her will, and left to the bishop of Cloyne and serjeant Marshall, the property which he had designed for her cruel lover. The works of Swift are very respectable. He wrote poems, which possess elegance and beauty, but their humor is often coarse and licentious. His political writings are composed in a forcible and argumentative style, and when published they had a strong effect on the public opinion, and drew on the author the admiration and the applause of the great parliamentary leaders of the time. His Gulliver's Travels, a satirical romance, and his Tale of a Tub, in which he ridiculed popery and puritanism, were very popular works, and are still read with admiration. In his political principles he was a tory, and ably defended the succession of a protestant monarch to the throne. As the friend of Oxford, Pope, Addison, Congreve, Steele, Rowe, and other great and learned men, he was universally respected for the importance which his opinion acquired in the public esteem, and wherever he appeared he was courted and respected as a pleasing companion, and a man of information. Though a great humorist, and an excellent punster, he preserved delicacy in his conversation, and was best pleased when ladies were present, as he observed that they would banish whatever was indecorous, profane, or vulgar. As an ecclesiastic he was punctually exact, and as a man of the world he regarded wealth as the proof of independence, and therefore often made his frugality subservient to his avarice. He left by his will 11,000*l.* for the endowment of an hospital for idiots and lunatics, in the city of Dublin. His works have been published in 14 vols. 4to. also in 25 vols. 8vo. in 27 vols. small 8vo. and in 17 vols. 8vo. 1784, with an account of his Life by T. Sheridan.

SWIFT, Deane, a near relation of the dean of St. Patrick, was called Deane from the name of one of his maternal ancestors. He published in 1755 an Essay on the Life, Writings, and Character of Dr. Jonathan Swift; in 1765 an eighth quarto volume of the dean's works, and in 1768, 2 vols. of his letters. He intended a complete edition of his relation's works, but died before it was finished, at Worcester, 12th July, 1783.

SWINBURNE, Henry, a native of York. He was educated at Oxford, and took his degree of L.L. B. and became proctor and judge of the prerogative court of the archbishop of York. He wrote Brief treatise on Testaments and Last Wills, 4to. — treatise of Sponfals or Matrimonial Contracts, 4to. &c. and died at York, 1620.

SWINDEN, Tobias, an English divine, author of a curious Inquiry into the Nature and Place of Hell, which he places in the sun. This work, first published in 8vo. 1714, appeared again with an appendix, 1727, and was translated into French by Bion, Amsterdam, 1728, 8vo. The author, who was vicar of Cuxton in Kent, died about 1720.

SWINNOCK, George, a native of Maidstone, educated at Cambridge, from which he removed to Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He lost, in 1662, his living of Great Kymbels, Bucks, for non-conformity, and died at Maidstone, 1673. He was author of Heaven and Hell Epitomized, 4to. — the Door of Salvation Opened, 8vo. — the Christian Man's Calling, 3 vols. 4to. a useful work, and other divinity tracts, now little known.

SWINTON, John, B. D. an English antiquary, born 1703, at Bexton, Cheshire. He was originally servitor of Wadham college, Oxford, where, in consequence of his good conduct, he was elected scholar and fellow. When he had taken orders he obtained the living of St. Peter-le-Bailey in Oxford, and then went as chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn. As the situation did not agree with his health, he returned home through Venice, Presburg, and Vienna. He married in 1743, and in 1747 was elected keeper of the university records. He died 4th April, 1777, and his wife in 1784. They were both buried in Wadham chapel. He published some learned works, the best known of which are an Essay on the Words Δαιμον and Δαιμονιον, &c. — Inscriptiones Criticæ, &c. — and other curious dissertations, besides some sermons, and parts of the Ancient Universal History, comprehended in the 6th and 7th volumes of that useful work.

SYBRECHT, John, a landscape painter, born at Antwerp, 1630. His drawings, especially of views on the Rhine, were much admired. The duke of Buckingham invited him to England, and patronized him. His Derbyshire views possessed great merit. He died at London, 1703, and was buried in St. James's church.

SYDENHAM, Thomas, an eminent physician, born at Winford Eagle, Dorsetshire, 1624. He was of Magdalen dales hall, Oxford, which, when it was garrisoned by the king's forces, he left for London, but afterwards returned, and took his degree of M.B. 1648. He then subscribed to the authority of the parliamentary visitors, and was made fellow of All Souls, and some years afterwards settled as a physician at Westminster, and took his doctor's degree at Cambridge. From 1660 to 1670 he enjoyed a most extensive practice, and a reputation superior to that of his contemporaries, but the gout arrested his progress, and permitted him to go little abroad. He was, however, consulted at home, and his writings continued to improve and enlighten the medical world. He died in Pall Mall, 29th Dec. 1689, and was buried in St. James's church. In his practice he followed experience rather than theory, and observed the nature, properties, and symptoms of disease with such success and discrimination, that he has been called the father of physic among the moderns. He was the first who recommended a cool regimen in the small-pox. His treatises on nervous disorders, and on consumptive fevers are very valuable. His works were written in English, but translated into Latin by his friends, and universally esteemed by the learned of Europe. There were editions of them at Leyden, Geneva, Leipzig, and London.

SYDENHAM, Floyer, a learned man, born 1710, and educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. A. 1734. He undertook the translation of Plato, for which he was well qualified by his great knowledge of ancient literature, and published some parts; but poverty persecuted him, and clouded the happiest of his hours. He was at last arrested by a victualler, at whose house he had often had a scanty dinner, and he died while in confinement, 1788. The amiable character of the man, his unassuming modesty, and well known abilities, as well as his melancholy fate, deeply interested the friends of humanity and of science, and to that honorable feeling England owes the institution of the literary fund, a noble establishment, which tends to banish indigence and despair from the humble abodes of the professional favorite of the muses, and to shed a beam of comfort on his declining years.

SYLBURGIUS, Frederic, a learned German, born at Marburg, 1546. He was for some time school-master at Licha, but afterwards devoted himself to the study of ancient authors. He published learned editions of Herodotus, Aristotle, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Dion Cassius, Justin Martyr, &c. wrote some Greek poems, and also assisted Stephens in the compilation of his Greek Thesaurus. His Greek Grammar, and Etymologicon Magnum, folio, 1594, are highly valued. He died universally lamented, 1596.

SYLLA, Lucius Cornelius, a famous Roman, who acquired military fame in the armies of Marius and of Catullus. Success in the war against the Marri, and great popularity among the soldiers, incited him to aspire to the sovereign power under the title of dictator, and though opposed by Marius, he gained his purpose, and cruelly murdered the most powerful of the senators, who wished to curb his authority. After being absolute at Rome, he had the courage to lay down his office, and to retire to the inconsequence of a private life. He died at Puteoli, B. C. 78, aged 60. The last years of his life were spent disgracefully in low debauchery.

SYLVESTER, Matthæw, an English divine, educated at Cambridge, and ejected from the living of Gunterby, Lincolnshire for nonconformity 1662. He settled afterwards in London, as pastor to a dissenting congregation, and died there 1708. Besides some sermons he published Baxter's history of his Life and Times, in fol.

SYLVESTER, Joshua, an English poet, born 1563. He was noticed by Elizabeth and James I., and was for some time engaged in mercantile business. He was poetical pensioner to Henry, James' eldest son. He was obliged to leave his country, for what cause is unknown, and died at Middleburg in Holland, 28th Sep. 1618. He is known as the translator of Du Bartas' Divine Weeks, and works, 4to. and as the author of some poems, but of little merit.

SYLVIVS, Francis, professor of eloquence, and principal of the college of Tournay at Paris, was a native of Levilly near Amiens. He laboured zealously to introduce the right pronunciation of the Latin language in the colleges of France, and to supersede the barbarous jargon of the schools by the more elegant diction of Cicero. Besides commentaries, he wrote Progymnasmatum in Artem Oratoriam, &c. and died 1530. After the fashion of the times he altered his name of Dubois to the more classical word Sylvius.

SYLVIVS, Lambert, or VANDEN BOSCH, a Dutch writer, born at Dordrecht, He wrote the Theatre of illustrious men, &c. 2 vols. 4to. — History of his age, from 1667, to 1687. — History of sea heroes, 4to. — with figures, tragedies, poems, &c. He died 1688, aged 78.

SYLVIVS, Francis de le Boe, a native of Hanau in Veteravia, professor of medicine at Leyden, where he ably demonstrated the truth of Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood. He promoted also the study of chemistry, and died 14th. Nov. 1672, aged 58. His works have been collected by Elzevir, 1679, 4to. and fol. Venice 1708.

SYLVIVS, James, or DUBOIS, an eminent French physician, born at Amiens in Picardy 1478. After receiving an excellent education, he devoted himself totally to medicine, and to the study of Hippocrates and Galen. He gave lectures on the medical art at Paris, with such success that other physicians, jealous of his fame, exclaimed against him, as he had been graced by no degree. In consequence of this, he went to Montpellier, but his avarice was so great that he would not spend money to procure the university honors. He afterwards obtained a degree, by interest, at Paris, and in 1548 was nominated to the medical chair of the royal college. He died 1555. His great learning was obscured by his uncommon avarice, and he unfortunately was engaged with his pupil Vesalius. His works have often been printed, called Opera Medica, the best edition of which is that of Cologne 1630.

SYMMACHUS, Q. Aur. Avianus, a learned Roman, who who warmly opposed Christianity, and wished for the re-establishment of paganism at Rome. He was banished by Theodosius. His epistles are extant.

SYNCELLUS, a monk of Constantinople 792, author of a chronography in Greek and Latin.

SYNESIUS, a native of Africa, made bishop of Ptolemais 410. His epistles and homilies remain, and possess merit. There was a Platonic philosopher of that name, author of a treatise on natural philosophy, &c.

SYNGE, Edward, a pious prelate, second son of the bishop of Cork, was born at Inishonane, in Ireland, where his father was then vicar, 6th April 1659. He was educated at Cork school, and then came to Christ-church Oxford, where he took his first degree, and afterwards completed his studies at Dublin university. He distinguished himself for above 20 years, as an active and laborious parish priest in Ireland, and in consequence of his great zeal in favor of the Hanoverian succession was made bishop of Raphoe in 1714, and two years after advanced to the primacy of Tuam. He died at Tuam 1741, and was buried in the church-yard of his cathedral. His tracts are valuable, as written in a popular style, and for the active promotion of piety and virtue. They have appeared in 4 vols. 12mo. and often been reprinted, especially by the society for promoting christian knowledge. Dr. Synge had the singular fortune, of being a bishop, the son and the nephew of a bishop, and the father of two bishops.

SYPHAX, a king of Numidia, who revolted from the side of the Romans, to the cause of Carthage, and of Asdrubal, whose daughter he had married. He was defeated by Masinissa, and died in prison at Rome B. C. 201.

T.

TAC

TABOR, John Otto, a native of Bautzen in Lusatia. On the destruction of his country during the wars of Germany, he retired to Gießen where he became counsellor to the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt. He died at Frankfort 1674, where he had retired a few years before, aged 70. His works, which are all on law, were published 1688, in 2 vols. fol. An account of his life was written by Paschius his son-in-law.

TABOUROT, Stephen, called Sieur des Accords, a French writer, born 1549. He was king's proctor at Dijon, and distinguished himself by some curious and eccentric publications. He died 1590. His bigarrures, &c. consisting of apophthegms, epitaphs, dialogues, conundrums, &c. not always on the most delicate subjects, were published, 2 vols. 12mo.

TACCA, Peter James, a native of Carara, who studied sculpture under John of Bologna. He travelled into Spain and France, and acquired great celebrity. He died at Florence, 1640. The best of his pieces is an equestrian statue of Philip IV. at Madrid. His statue of Henry IV. at Paris, his Jane of Austria, his Ferdinand III. of Tuscany, and the four slaves in bronze, in the harbour of Leghorn, are also much admired. His son Ferdinand was also an able sculptor, and his statue of Ferdinand was among his best pieces.

TACHARD, Guy, a French jesuit, sent in 1686 as missionary to Siam. He, with the ambassadors Chaumont and Choisi, visited Europe, 1688, and then returned, and died at Bengal of a contagious disorder, 1694. An account of his voyages to Siam have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1686, and 1689, but he is very credulous and inaccurate.

TAL

TACITUS, Caius Cornel. a celebrated Roman historian. He was also eminent as a pleader, and as the assertor and the advocate of virtue and innocence, in the reigns of Domitian and Nerva. Of his historical works some have perished. His annals are very valuable. His language and style possess elegance and spirit, purity and nervous strength.

TACITUS, Marcus Claudius, emperor of Rome after Aurelian 275, was a wise, benevolent, and patriotic monarch. He was also distinguished as a warrior, and died 276, aged 70, as he was preparing to go against the Persians.

TACONNET, Toussaint Gaspard, a native of Paris, known for his eccentricities. He was for some time a player, and then a poet, and rendered himself ridiculous by his intemperance. He wrote several farces and plays, of which the heroes are persons of low birth and mean professions. He died in the hospital of charity at Paris, 29th Dec. 1774, aged 44.

TACQUET, Andrew, a jesuit of Antwerp, eminent for his knowledge of mathematics, and his publications, a treatise on Astronomy — an edition of Euclid, &c. He died 1660. His works were collected into one vol. fol. 1669, and 1707, at Antwerp.

TAFFI, Andrew, a native of Florence, eminent as being the artist who introduced the art of designing in mosaic, which he had learnt from some Greeks. His best piece is a dead Christ, in a chapel at Florence. He died 1294, aged 81.

TALBERT, Francis Xavier, a native of Besançon. He abandoned the law, for which his father, a counsellor of the parliament of Franche-Comté, designed him, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession and obtained a canonry at Besançon. He was a popular and eloquent preacher at Luneville, Versailles, and Paris, and in 1791, he quitted France, to reside in Italy, and afterwards went with the princess of Nassau, into Poland. He died at Lemberg in Galicia, 4th June 1803, aged 78. He is author of a discourse on inequality among men, crowned at Dijon, 1755. — Panegyric of St. Louis — Eloges of Bonnet, Montaigne, cardinal Amboise, Philip regent of France, Boileau, &c. and some poetical pieces.

TALBOT, John, earl of Shrewsbury, a warlike Englishman descended from a Norman family, distinguished himself in the reduction of Ireland, of which he was made governor by Henry V. He was afterwards in France with the English army, and took Alençon, Pontoise, and Laval, but was repulsed at the siege of Orleans, by Joan of Arc. He was afterwards taken prisoner at the battle of Patay, but when restored to liberty he signalized himself at the siege of Beaumont-sur-Oise, and afterwards invaded Guienne, and took Bourdeaux, and other towns. This brave warrior who was the terror of the French, and deservedly named the Achilles of England, at last fell in battle near Castillon, a town of which he was attempting to raise the siege, 17th July 1453.

TALBOT, Peter, a native of Ireland, almoner to Catherine, wife of Charles II. He was a zealous papist, and was made by pope Clement IX. archbishop of Dublin. He was seized by the protestants, and died in prison 1682. He wrote de Naturâ Fidei & Hæresis — Tractatus de Religione, and other works.

TALBOT, Richard, earl of Tyrconnel, brother to the preceding, was made viceroy of Ireland by James II. and he opposed the invasion of William III. He died 1692.

TALBOT, Charles, earl and duke of Shrewsbury, was one of the warmest promoters of the revolution, and for his services he was created a duke. He was afterwards made lord chamberlain, and went to Ireland as viceroy, and afterwards held the office of high-treasurer. He died 1717, aged 57.

TALBOT, William, a native of Lichfield, educated at Oriel college, Oxford, where he entered 1674. The interest of his relation the earl of Shrewsbury opened for him the door of preferment, and he became dean of Worcester 1691, bishop of Oxford 1699, of Sarum 1715, and six years after was translated to Durham. He died 1730. He wrote sermons which have been published in 1 vol. 8vo.

TALBOT, Charles lord, son of the preceding, rose by his merit to high offices in the law, and was at last made lord chancellor. To the deepest knowledge of law and of politics, he joined the soundest virtue and the most incorruptible integrity. He died 1737, aged 51.

TALHAIARN, a Welsh bard of the sixth century. He composed a prayer which was adopted by the whole body of bards in Wales, and he afterwards retired to the solitude of a hermitage where he was visited as a saint of superior virtues.

TALIAECOTIUS, Gaspar, or TAGLIACOCEI, an Italian surgeon, at Bologna, where he died 1553, aged 64. He wrote a treatise "de Curatorum Chirurgiâ per Infitionem," Venice, fol. 1597, which is known in England by the ludicrous allusion to it in Hudibras, "So learned Taliacotius from" &c. In this work he pretended that he could restore the nose, ears, &c. to their original form and appearance in case of mutilation, or deformity. He is represented at Bologna in a statue with a nose in his hand, as expressive of the art which he practised.

TALIESIN, a Welsh bard of great celebrity. He flourished about the sixth century. Several of his compositions are preserved in the Archæology of Wales, and are mentioned with applause.

TALLARD, Camille d'Hostun, count de, a celebrated marshal of France, born 14th Feb. 1652, in Dauphiné. He early distinguished himself as a soldier, and in 1672, was under Lewis XIV. in Holland, and soon after gained the approbation and friendship of Turenne, by his noble conduct in the battles of Mulhausen and Turkheim. In 1693 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant general, and in 1697, was sent as ambassador to England, concerning the succession to the Spanish crown in the person of Charles II. In 1702 he was placed at the head of the armies on the Rhine, and made marshal of France soon after. He defeated the Imperialists under the prince of Hesse, before the town of Landau, which he took after a short siege; but his pompous ostentation of announcing the victory rendered him ridiculous. "I have," said he, "obtained more standards than your majesty has lost soldiers." In 1704 he was opposed to the great Marlborough, and at the battle of Blenheim, was taken prisoner and brought to England, where he continued seven years. On his return to Paris, 1712, he was created a duke, and in 1726, made secretary of state. He died March 3d, 1728.

TALLIS, Thomas, an eminent English musician in the 16th century. He was organist, it is said, in the chapel of Henry VIII. and of his three successors. Under Mary he was only, it is supposed, gentleman of the chapel, and received for his salary, 7½d. a-day, and under Elizabeth he had Bird as his fellow organist. He may be said to be the father of the cathedral style, especially in England. He published, with Bird, a collection of hymns, chiefly from the English liturgy, for church service, &c. He died 23d Nov. 1585, and was buried in Greenwich church, Kent.

TAMERLANE, or TIMUR BEG, or TIMUR the Lame, from some defect in his feet, was born in the village of Kesch, in ancient Sogdiana, 1335. Whether the son of a shepherd, or descended from the royal race, is unknown; but, however, the obscurity of his first years was soon forgotten in the glory of his exploits. Distinguished by courage, by intrepidity, and by unbounded ambition, he soon gained a number of faithful adherents, and at their head, he seized the city of Balk, the capital of Khorasan, and easily subdued the province of Candahar, the kingdom of Persia, and Bagdad. Elate with his success he now meditated the conquest of India, and though his soldiers at first refused to follow, their hesitation was soon conquered by promises, and the powerful aid of a pretended prophet. Thus seconded by an enthusiastic army, he penetrated to India, took Delhi, with the immense treasures tures of the Mogul, and returned to conquer Damascus, and to punish Bagdad, that presumed to shake off his yoke. The offending city was given up to the pillage of his soldiers, and 80,000 of her inhabitants put to the sword. Now master of the fairer part of Asia, he interfered, at the request of the Greek emperor, in the affairs of Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, and sent to him a haughty message, commanding him to abandon the siege of Constantinople, and to restore the princes whom he had deposed. The message roused the indignation of Bajazet; he marched against this new enemy, and was defeated by Tamerlane in the plains of Ancyra, in Phrygia, after a dreadful battle, which continued three days. Bajazet fell into the hands of the conqueror, and was treated with great inhumanity, and carried about in mockery in an iron cage. Some writers, however, deny this, and affirm, that the conduct of Tamerlane towards the captive prince, was as humane and honorable as fallen greatness merited. To these last conquests Tamerlane added Egypt, and the immense treasures of Cairo, and then fixed the seat of his empire at Samarcand, where he received the homage of submissive princes, and among them, of Manuel Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople, and Henry III. king of Castille, by their ambassadors. Tamerlane was preparing fresh victories by the invasion of China, when death stopped his career, April 1st, 1405, in the 36th year of his reign. He appointed his grandson as his successor over that vast empire, which he had acquired with such astonishing success and rapidity.

TANAQUIL, wife of the elder Tarquin, persuaded her husband to go and settle at Rome, where he was elected king. Her memory was held in great respect by the Romans.

TANEVOT, Alexander, first commissary of the finances, was born at Versailles, and died at Paris, 1773, aged 81. He wrote Sethos, and Adam and Eve, two tragedies, besides fables, stories, epistles, songs, &c. which were collected into 3 vols. 12mo. 1766. His style is pure, easy, and flowing, though he occasionally degenerates into a feeble and insipid diction. Though he had the power of enriching himself, he died poor, but highly respected.

TANNER, Thomas, a learned antiquary, born 1674, at Market Lavington, Wilts, where his father was minister. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and became chaplain and fellow of All-Souls. In 1701 he was made chancellor of Norwich, and rector of Thorpe, and afterwards prebendary of Ely, canon of Christ-church, and in 1732, bishop of St. Asaph. He died at Christ-church, Oxford, 14th Dec. 1735, and was buried in the cathedral. He is known as the author of Notitia Monastica, or a short History of all the Religious Houses in England and Wales, 8vo. 1695, republished in folio, 1744 — Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica, the labor of 40 years, published 1748, folio. He also contributed to Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, last edition, &c.

TANSILLO, Luigi, an Italian poet, born at Nola 1520. The best part of his life was spent in the service of Don Pedro de Toledo viceroy of Naples, and he was made judge of Gaeta, and died after 1596. He was esteemed as a poet, but his il Vendemiatore, or the Vintager, a poem 1534, was considered so indelicate and licentious that his writings were put into the index expurgatorius of the pope. He published besides other poems, and reconciled himself to the see of Rome, by his "Tears of St. Peter," which removed the papal interdicts from his writings, except the Vintager. His poems consist of sonnets, songs, comedies, &c. The Tears of St. Peter were translated by Malherbe into French.

TANUCCI, Bernard, marquis de, chief minister of Naples, was born of poor parents at Stia, in Tuscany, 1698. He studied at Pisa, and by his merit rose to the chair of jurisprudence in that university. On the coming of Don Carlos to succeed to the Neapolitan throne, the professor, who had been recommended to the new king, and who had defended the legality of seizing a murderer from the asylum of a church against the opinions of the see of Rome, was raised to the office of minister, and by his firmness and wisdom, deserved the high appointment. For 50 years he continued in this important office, and after contributing zealously to the prosperity of the kingdom, and to establish its independence from the ecclesiastical superiority of Rome, he resigned in 1777, and died 29th April, 1783. This enlightened minister encouraged literature; and to his zeal in the cause of science, antiquarians are indebted for the important discoveries, and the valuable collections made in the subterraneous towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii.

TARGE, J. B., professor of mathematics, and author of a general history of Italy, from the fall of the Roman empire, to modern times, 4 vols. 12mo. — translated Smollet's history of England, 19 vols. 12mo. — Barrow's travels, 12 vols. 12mo. — and died at Orleans, 1788. He wrote also an history of England, from the treaty of Aix la Chapelle to 1763, 5 vols. 12mo.

TARIN, Peter, a French physician, born at Courtenai. He died in 1761, but his age is unknown. His writings were held in great esteem, especially his Adversaria Anatomica, 4to. — Anatomical Dictionary, 4to. — Osteographia, 4to. — the Art of Dissecting, 2 vols. 12mo. — a treatise on Ligaments — Observations on Medicine and Surgery, 3 vols. 12mo. — a description of the Muscles, 4to. with figures, &c.

TARLETON, Richard, a native of Condover in Shropshire, who distinguished himself as an actor, and was patronized by Robert earl of Leicester. He performed the character of judge in a play called Henry V. acted at the Bull, Bishopsgate street, London, before the Henry V. of Shakespear was written. He was one of the queen's players in 1583 according to Stowe, and he died 1589. The seven deadly sins are mentioned as one of his dramatic compositions, and his jokes are still preserved in several collections.

TARPA, Spur. Metius, a learned Roman appointed by Augustus to examine with four others the compositions of contemporary poets.

TARPEIA, daughter of Tarpeius the governor of Rome, under Romulus. It is said that she betrayed the gates of the city to the Sabines, and that she was overwhelmed by the bucklers of the enemy thrown upon her as they entered through the street.

TARQUIN the elder, 5th king of Rome, settled at Rome from Tarquinii the place of his birth, and by liberality liberality and mildness so gained the hearts of the Romans, that on the death of Ancus Martius he was elected king. He was a benevolent prince, and adorned his city with stately buildings, and aqueducts, and added dignity and consequence to the body of the senate and to the magistrates. He was assassinated by the sons of Ancus Martius, B. C. 578, aged 80.

TARQUIN the second, or the Proud, was grandson to the elder Tarquin. He was brave, but his rise to the throne by the murder of his father-in-law Tullius, rendered him deservedly unpopular. The licentious and cruel conduct of his son proved fatal to his interests; and while he was at the siege of Ardea, the Romans took up arms and shut him out of their city. He took refuge among the cities of Etruria, and died there, aged 90.

TARRAKANOFF, N. princess of, daughter of Elizabeth empress of Russia, by her secret marriage with Alexis Rozoumoffski, was carried away at the age of 12 by prince Radzivil in 1767, and concealed in a convent at Rome. This singular step was taken by the dissatisfied noble, to curb the views of the ambitious Catharine, but they failed, and Alexis Orloff pretending greater discontent against the government of the empress, prevailed upon the princess, in the absence of Radzivil, to marry him, and by her influence and preference to excite a new insurrection in Russia. The unsuspecting princess no sooner yielded her person to her seducer, than she was seized in the bay of Leghorn, where she had been conducted on pretence of paying her military honors, and cruelly bound in chains and conveyed to Petersburg. In Dec. 1777, a violent rising of the Neva suddenly forced the waters into her prison, and the unfortunate princess was drowned before any assistance could extricate her.

TARRANTIUS, Lucius, a Roman, the friend of Cicero, who is said to have made two curious horoscopes.

TARTAGLIA, Nicholas, a native of Brescia, called the most eminent mathematician of his times. He published an Italian translation of Euclid, with a commentary, fol. 1543 — a treatise of Numbers and Measures — Nova Scientia, and other works, 3 vols. 4to. 1606. He died about 1557, in a good old age.

TARTINI, Joseph, a musician, called the Admirable by Dr. Burney, was born April 1692, at Pirano in Istria. He studied the law at Padua, but his powers were formed for musical eminence, and by practice and application he became one of the best performers on the violin, and was made master of the band in the church of St. Antony of Padua. He died 26th Feb. 1770 at Padua, universally respected and endeared to the inhabitants by a residence of 50 years. He wrote, sonatas, a treatise on music 1754, and other things, and was a great admirer of Corelli.

TARUFFI, Emilius, a native of Bologna, distinguished as a painter. His landscapes were particularly admired for boldness of expression, and for the correctness and animation of his figures. He died 1694, aged 62.

TASKER, William, a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his first degree in arts. He afterwards obtained the living of Iddefleigh, in Devonshire, and died there, 1800. He distinguished himself as a poet, and published, Odes of Pindar and Horace, in English verse, 3 vols. 8vo. — Ode to the warlike Genius of Britain — Letter on Physiognomy, &c.

TASMAN, N. a Dutch navigator. He sailed from Batavia, 1642, and discovered New Holland, and New Zealand, which were regarded as a southern continent, till the more minute investigation of captain Cook ascertained their insular form and situation. He visited also Gilolo, New Guinea, and other islands, on his return to Europe.

TASSO, Bernardo, an Italian poet, better known as the father of the illustrious Tasso. The best esteemed of his poems is Amadis in 100 cantos, and his letters also are regarded as very valuable by the Italians. He died at Rome in the convent of St. Onuphrius, 1575. The best edition of his letters is that of Padua, 3 vols. 8vo. 1733, and of his poem 1560, 4to.

TASSO, Torquato, a celebrated Italian poet, son of the above. He was born at Sorrento in the kingdom of Naples, 11th March, 1544. His father was secretary to San Severino, prince of Salerno, and he shared his honor and his disgrace. When the prince made a complaint to Charles V. against the viceroy of Naples, who wished to introduce the inquisition into the kingdom, he was condemned, and the cruel sentence was pronounced not only against him but against his secretary, and also his son the future poet, who was only nine years old. They withdrew from the fatal punishment by flight, and came to Rome, where the young poet already wrote verses, and compared his escape to the adventures of Aeneas and Æneas flying from Troy. From Rome he was sent to Padua to study the law, and there he took his degrees in philosophy and theology, but poetry was his favorite pursuit, and at the age of 17 he produced his Rinaldo. In 1565, he placed himself under the protection of Alphonso duke of Ferrara, and he accompanied his brother, the cardinal, in an embassy from pope Gregory XIII. to the court of Charles IX. of France. On his return to Ferrara he imprudently became enamoured of the sister of his patron, and this passion joined to the malevolent insinuations of his enemies and persecutors, proved the cause of that melancholy, which embittered his life for 20 years. To fly from the scene of his misery he retired to his sister's house at Sorrento, and there spent a whole summer, but absence increased his flame. He returned to Ferrara, and in the midst of a crowded assembly he had the imprudence to embrace his favorite princess Eleonora. The duke, who was present, with great coolness, ordered his courtiers to remove the poet, whom he pronounced insane, to a place of confinement, and there in the hospital of St. Anne the unfortunate lover mourned his misfortunes, a prey to lingering disease, and at intervals deprived of his reason. The interference of the duke Vincent de Gonzaga, at last restored him to liberty 1586, and he retired to Naples in quest of tranquillity and happiness. His great merits now eclipsed the clouds, which envy and malice had raised around him, and his poetical works began to be regarded as the pride and glory of Italy. Sensible of his deserved reputation, the pope Clement VIII. in a full congregation of cardinals, determined to encircle his brows with the laurel crown, and to honor him with a triumph. The poet was sent for from Naples, and received with all due honors at the distance of one mile from Rome, and the most magnificent preparations were made for the ceremony in the capitol. Vain, however, are the schemes of man, Tasso as if persecuted by fortune, to the last moment of life, was taken ill, and the preparations made for his coronation ended in the melancholy procession of his funeral, as he died the evening before the intended ceremony, 15th April, 1595, aged 51. He derives his celebrity and the palm of immortality from his Jerusalem Delivered, a poem well conducted throughout, and abounding with all the pleasing description of tender scenes, the animated representation of battles, and the majestic flow of language, which so much captivate and overpower the reader in the pages of Homer and Virgil. Besides his Jerusalem, which is familiar to the English reader in the elegant translation of Mr. Hoole and of Miss Watts, Tasso wrote Jerusalem Conquered — Rinaldo — Aminta, a pastoral — Torissmond, a tragedy, &c. His life has been written by the marquis Manzo. His works have been published in various forms, the best of which is that of Florence, 6 vols. fol. 1724.

TASSONI Alexander, an Italian poet, born at Modena 1565. Though early an orphan, his abilities displayed themselves through want and obscurity. He was in the service of cardinal Colonna, and of the dukes of Savoy and of Modena, and died 1635. He wrote "Secchia Rapita, or Rape of the Bucket," a mock-heroic poem much admired in Italy for its elegance and delicate humor. It was written in consequence of the war between Modena and Bologna. He wrote besides, observations on Petrarch, an ecclesiastical history, &c.

TATE, Nabum, a native of Dublin, born 1652, and educated at the college there. He was befriended by Dryden, and patronized by Dorset, and succeeded Shadwell as poet laureat, with a salary of 100l. per annum, and a butt of canary. He wrote nine dramatic pieces, but he is now little known but as the joint translator of the psalms of David with Dr. Brady. Of his miscellaneous poems, that on the death of queen Anne was most admired. He died 12th Aug. 1715, at the mint, where he resided to escape from the persecution of his creditors.

TATIAN, a Syrian pagan, who was converted to christianity and became the disciple of Justin Martyr. He still retained the principles of the platonists and fell into the errors of Marcion. Of his works nothing remains but an apology for the christian religion, edited 1700, 8vo. at Oxford.

TATISCHEF, Vassili, a Russian historian, engaged for 30 years in collecting materials for the history of his country. He died before his labors were completed 1750. The work is rather a series of connected chronicles than a regular history. The part published by Muller was 3 vols. 4to.

TATIUS, king of the Sabines, took possession of the Roman capitol, but was reconciled to Romulus, with whom he shared the kingdom. He was murdered at Lavium B. C. 742.

TATIUS, Achilles, a native of Alexandria, who became a christian. He is author of a commentary on Aratus' phenomena, and of the loves of Leucippus and Clitophon, a Greek romance.

TAVANES, Gaspard de Saulx de, a French general, born 1509. He was taken prisoner with Francis I. at the fatal battle of Pavia, and afterwards became the companion of the king's second son the duke of Orleans. Called away at last from scenes of dissipation and extravagance, he became an ornament to the military profession. He prevailed upon the rebellious citizens of Rochelle to return to their duty in 1542, and two years after he ably contributed to the victory of Cerisoles. He distinguished himself so much at the battle of Renti in 1554, that the king seeing him covered with dust and with blood tore the order of St. Michael which he wore round his own neck, to throw it around that of his valiant general. His courage again was displayed at the sieges of Calais and Thionville, and afterwards at the famous victories of Jarnac and Moncontour; but his character in the eyes of humanity must deservedly suffer for the countenance and support which he gave to the bloody massacre of St. Bartholomew, though he had the magnanimity to save from the horrors of that dreadful day the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé. He died at Sully 29th June, 1573, as he was preparing to go to the siege of Rochelle, which had again revolted. His son William was governor of Burgundy, and espoused the cause of the league, which he maintained at the battle of Ivry, but he was afterwards reconciled to Henry IV. and died 1633. The family long distinguished itself in the military service of France.

TAVARONE, Lazarus, a Genoese painter, the disciple of Luca Cangiagio, and his successor in the service of the Spanish king. He died 1631, aged 75.

TAUBMAN, Frederic, a German critic, born at Wunsch in Franconia, 1565. He was well educated at Culmbach, though his father-in-law was but a taylor, and on the foundation of the college of Heilbrun 1582, he was removed thither among other promising students. Ten years after he went to Wittemberg, and became the favorite of the prince of Saxony, and in 1595, obtained the professorship of poetry and belles lettres, which he kept till his death 1613. His private character was very amiable. He left a widow and five children. He wrote commentarius in Plautum, 1605, an also in Virgilium, — de Lingua Latina Disertatio, besides Latin poems, &c.

TAVERNIER, John Baptist, a famous traveller born at Paris 1605. He acquired a fondness for travelling, in the house and conversation of his father who was a merchant, and after visiting the best part of Europe, before he had completed his 23d year, he meditated more distant excursions in mercantile pursuits as a trader in jewels. In the space of 40 years he is said to have travelled six times into Turkey, Persia, and the East Indies, by various routes, and after being ennobled by Lewis XIV. he, in 1668, purchased Aubonne near Geneva, there to spend the rest of his days, in the enjoyment of independence and tranquillity. His affairs however were afterwards thrown into disorder by the ill conduct of a nephew, and to repair pair his losses he began a seventh journey into the East. He died on his way at Moscow, July 1689, aged 84. His travels 6 vols. 12mo. were published in French, with the assistance of his friends, as he was not a perfect master of the language, and they have been translated into English.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, a celebrated prelate, son of a barber at Cambridge. At the age of 13 he was admitted at Caius college, Cambridge. And when he had taken orders, he removed to London, where he was introduced to Laud, who admired his abilities as a scholar, and his eloquence as a preacher, and by his influence, procured him a fellowship at All-souls college, Oxford, 1636. He was afterwards made chaplain to his patron, who bestowed upon him the rectory of Uppingham, and in 1642, he was created by royal mandamus doctor in divinity. During the civil troubles he retired to Carmarthenshire, where he maintained himself by teaching a school, till the death of three sons in three months rendered his retirement extremely unpleasant, and therefore he retired to London, and soon after accompanied lord Conway to Ireland, and settled at Portmore. At the restoration he came back to England, and in 1662, he was nominated to the bishopric of Down and Connor, and to the administration of Dromore, and was appointed vice-chancellor of the university of Dublin. He died of a fever at Lisnegarvy 13th Aug. 1667, and was buried in a chapel which he had erected on the ruins of Dromore cathedral. His friend and successor Dr. Rust represents him as a most learned man, of solid judgment, keen sagacity, and the most lively imagination, to which were united all the mild virtues of private life. His writings are universally known and admired, the best of which are, his life and death of Jesus Christ, folio. — Holy living and dying, 8vo. — Ductor Dubitantium — Cases of Conscience. — Discourse on the liberty of prophecy, &c.

TAYLOR, John, called the water poet, was born in Gloucestershire 1580. From Gloucester school, where he learnt little, he was bound apprentice to a waterman in London, but in the midst of his laborious vocation he often indulged in poetry. In 1642, he came to Oxford where he kept a victualling house, and assisted the King's service by his facetious songs and ballads against the round heads. When Oxford surrendered, he went to London, and kept a public house in Phoenix alley, Long Acre, which he called the Mourning Crown. The sign however displeased the government, and instead of it he hung up his own effigy, with these lines under,

There's many a head stands for a sign,

Then gentle reader, why not mine?

And, on the other side, these,

Though I deserve not, I desire

The laurel wreath, the poet's hire.

He died 1654, aged 74, and his portrait was given by his nephew, a painter, to the picture gallery Oxford. It is said that he wrote 80 books, more facetious than elegant.

TAYLOR, John, a dissenting minister of abilities, was born near Lancaster. He was settled 20 years at Kirkstead Lincolnshire, and then removed to Norwich, and afterwards, by pressing invitations, to Warrington, where he was engaged to superintend the academy there. In this situation, where he expected independence and comfort, he soon found opposition and ill treatment, and this weighed so much upon his mind, that it shortened his days. He died 5th March 1761. He wrote a treatise on Original Sin, — various theological tracts, &c. but his most valuable work is a Hebrew and English Concordance, 2 vols. folio.

TAYLOR, John, an eminent critic, born 1703, at Shrewsbury, where his father was a barber. He was educated at the grammar school there, and at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow 1730. He soon distinguished himself by his publications, and was appointed, by the university, its librarian, and afterwards registrar. He took his doctor's degree in civil law, and was of Doctors Commons, and afterwards became known to lord Carteret, who entrusted him with the education of his sons. After some hesitation he took orders and obtained the rectory of Lawford, Essex, the archdeaconry of Bucks, and the residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He died April 4th 1766, universally and deservedly lamented, and was buried nearly under the litany desk in St. Paul's. His publications were numerous and highly respectable. Besides public orations and other tracts, he published "Elements of the Civil Law" 4to. 1755, and 1769, — valuable editions of Lyfias and Demosthenes, — a Latin dissertation on the Marmor Sandvicense, &c.

TAYLOR, Brook, an eminent philosopher and mathematician, born at Edmonton 28th Aug. 1685. He was educated at home, and at the age of 15 entered at St. John's college Cambridge, and in 1709, took his degree of L. L. B. He became known by his treatise on the Center of Oscillation, and in 1712, was admitted into the royal society, and two years after elected the secretary of that learned body. He took the degree of L. L. D. in 1714 and continued to distinguish himself by his philosophical publications. He visited Paris in 1717, and was honorably received by the French literati, and soon after his return he resigned the office of secretary to the royal society. He was twice married, and had the singular misfortune of losing both his wives very soon after his union with them, a melancholy circumstance, which in some degree hastened his end. His first wife died 1723, and the second whom he married in 1725, died in child-bed 1729, and on the 29th Dec. 1741, he himself fell a victim to a consumptive disorder in his 46th year. He was buried at St. Ann's, Soho. His works on mathematical subjects are very valuable, especially his new Principles of Linear Perspective, which has often been republished and also improved by Colson of Cambridge. He wrote also Contemplatio Philosophica, published by sir William Young, the son of his only surviving daughter by his second wife.

TEILO, a British saint in the fifth century. It is said that he founded a college at Landaff, and erected that church into a bishop's see. Several churches in Wales bear his name.

TEISSIER, Anthony, a native of Montpellier, who quitted quitted France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Prussia. He was made by the elector historiographer, with a handsome salary, and counsellor of embassies. He died at Berlin, 1715, aged 83. He is author of Eloges of learned Men, from de Thou's History, 4 vols. 12mo. — Catalogus Auctorum qui Librorum Catalogos Indices Bibliothecas, Virorum Literatorum Elogia, Vitam aut Orationes Funebres scriptis Consignarunt, 8vo. — the Duties of Man as a Citizen, from Puffendorf — Moral and Political Instructions — Calvin's Letters — the Life of Illustrious Princes, &c.

TEKELI, Emmeric, count de, a noble Hungarian, who escaped from the captivity which the Austrians prepared against his father for his attachment to the cause of some rebellious chiefs. From Poland, where he had concealed himself, Tekeli issued forth to head the Hungarian malcontents, and he proved successful against the forces of Austria. Assisted by the armies of the Turks, and by the Transylvanians, he wished to assume the title of king, but the terror which he spread among the Imperialists did not further his views of ambition, nor promote a reconciliation with the emperor. He joined in the siege of Vienna with the vizier Mustapha; but though the disasters which happened were attributed to him by the suspicious Turk, he hastened to Adrianople to justify himself in the presence of the grand signior Mahomet, who assured him of his protection, and bestowed on him the principality of Transylvania. This was but an empty title, as the province was in the hands of the Austrians, and therefore, after a vain but gallant struggle against Heuller, the governor of the country, he retired from the contest, and lived in a private manner at Constantinople. He was a man of great courage, but though admired for his intrepidity, he wanted judgment, and that commanding presence of mind which often converts dangers into prosperous events in the career of the military hero. He died near Nicomedia, 13th Sept. 1705, aged 47.

TELL, William, a celebrated Swiss, one of the heroes who restored liberty to their oppressed country in 1307. The conspiracy which he had formed with others was suspected, when the Austrian governor, Herman Gesler, more clearly to ascertain the spirit of the people, ordered a hat to be raised on a pole, and homage to be paid to it as to himself. Tell refused, and when seized for disobedience, was directed to shoot an arrow at an apple placed on the head of his own son, or else to be dragged with his child to immediate death. He cleft the apple in two without injuring his son, and declared that the other arrow which he had in his girdle was intended for the heart of the governor if he had hurt his child. This boldness occasioned his confinement, and the governor, afraid of a rescue, carried him across the lake of Lucern; but a violent storm obliged Gesler, who knew the nautical skill of his prisoner, to entrust to him the helm for his own preservation. Tell, freed from his fetters, steered the boat to a rock, still called by his name, leaped ashore, and escaped into the mountains. The governor afterwards was shot by the hand of Tell, and the Swiss, roused to arms by the conduct of their hero, drove away their Austrian masters, and established the independence of their country. Tell, 47 years after this great event, lost his life in an inundation at Burgeln, 1354. His descendants became extinct in the male line in 1684, and in the female 1720.

TELLIER, Michaelle, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 19th April, 1603. After filling various law offices about the court, he was in 1640 named intendant of Piedmont, and gained the favor of cardinal Mazarin, who recommended him to Lewis XIII. as a proper person to be secretary of state. He displayed great abilities in this office, and during the political disputes which agitated France after the death of Lewis XIII. he possessed the confidence of the queen mother and of the cardinal, and contributed much to the restoration of concord and reconciliation among the contending parties. Though he resigned in 1666 his office to his son, he yet continued in the cabinet, and in 1677 was made chancellor of the kingdom. It is to be lamented that his many services were disgraced by a particular hatred against the protestants, whom he represented to the monarch as suspicious subjects. By his influence with Lewis XIV. the famous edict of Nantes was revoked, and the minister, triumphing in the cruel measures which he saw adopted, exclaimed profanely, "nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine, quia viderunt oculi mei salutare tuum." He died a few days after, 28th Oct. 1685, aged 83, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Bossuet. To great intrigue of character, and to deep dissimulation, he joined the imposing appearance of simple and austere manners, high talents for business, indefatigable application, and extensive knowledge.

TELLIER, Francis Michel le, marquis de Louvois, son of the chancellor of France, was born at Paris, Jan. 18th, 1641. The elevation of his father, as well as his own abilities recommended him to notice; at the age of 23 he was made war minister, and in 1666 he became secretary of state. He was a great favorite at court, and after the death of Colbert in 1683, he was placed by Lewis XIV. in the office of superintendent of buildings, arts, and manufactures. His attention was likewise directed to military affairs; he introduced more regular discipline into the army, supplied the magazines with provisions, and built the royal hospital of invalids. The consciousness, however, of his own abilities, rendered him proud and arrogant, and he even showed some marks of disrespect to his king. Lewis, in consequence of this, treated him with coldness, and the ambitious and disappointed minister, returning home from the levee, died in his own apartment of vexation and grief, 16th July, 1691. Though at last unpopular in the court, he was a statesman of most splendid talents, who united for the glory of France, promptitude, secrecy, spirit, and magnanimous conduct. Madame de Sevigné has elegantly commented on his death in her letters to her daughter. The "Testament Politique," published in his name, was written by Courtils.

TELLIER, Adrian le, a lawyer of Melun, who was returned as deputy to the national assembly of France, and afterwards to the convention. He was in 1795, sent by the convention to Chartres, to encourage a more free circulation of the corn, but the disaffected raised a violent cry against him, and obliged him not only to sign a decree, to reduce bread to three sous the pound, but to proclaim it, in the public square, mounted on the back of an ass. This indignity had such an effect on the feelings of this honest deputy, that he shot himself on returning to his lodgings, leaving a paper by which he declared the decree which he had signed void, and hoped that no blood but his own might be shed to restore the public tranquillity.

TELLIER, N. le, a faithful servant about the person of Barthelemy. When this virtuous minister was condemned, during the violent measures of the French revolution, to be deported in 1797, the honest domestic demanded to share his captivity, and, from the prison of the Temple, he was conveyed with him to Guyenne, where his attentions and kindnesses administered to his relief under a burning climate, and in the hands of cruel oppressors. When Barthelemy escaped from his dungeon, Tellier accompanied his flight; but this faithful friend died on the passage, before he reached the European shores.

TEMESTA, Antonio, a Florentine painter the disciple of Strada. His landscapes, animals and battles, were much admired for their spirit, and the delicacy of their coloring. He died 1630, aged 75. He also engraved some of his pieces.

TEMPLE, for William, an eminent statesman, son of sir William Temple, master of the Rolls in Ireland, was born in London, 1629. He was educated under the care of his uncle, Dr. Hammond, minister of Penhurst, Kent, and afterwards at Bishop's Stortford school, and at the age of 17 was admitted of Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he had Cudworth for his tutor. He did not continue more than one year at the university, and then travelled through France, Holland, Flanders, and Germany, and returned to England in 1654. He lived in Ireland during the usurpation, devoted to studious pursuits and philosophy; but at the restoration he became a member of the Irish parliament. About 1663 he removed with his family to England, and then began to be employed as an active and penetrating negotiator. He was chiefly instrumental in forming the triple league in 1668 between England, Holland, and Sweden, and also by his means the marriage of the lady Mary with the prince of Orange was effected. After spending twenty years in the affairs of the state, and in advancing her prosperity and consequence by his negotiations with foreign nations, he retired in 1680 from public life, and employed the rest of his time in literary pursuits, and in the cultivation of his grounds. But, though withdrawn from the intrigues of courts, his character for general information and for integrity, was too well known to be neglected; his advice and opinion were frequently consulted by the leading men of the nation, and even king William himself visited him to converse with him on political affairs. Sir William died at the end of 1700, at Moor Park, near Farnham, and according to his directions his heart was buried in a silver box under a sun-dial in his garden. Though universally respected as an able negociator, sir William is censured, and with justice, by bishop Burnet, not only for his vanity and spleen, but for his irreligious and profane principles. His only son John was a man of abilities, and was, in consequence of his merit, and his father's influence, made secretary at war under king William; but he had scarce been in office one week when he drowned himself at London bridge, 14th April, 1689. The cause of this melancholy event is said to have originated in his recommending to the king too warmly, though innocently, general Hamilton, who, instead of reducing to obedience Tyrconnel, the rebellious viceroy of Ireland, encouraged and assisted him in his defection. This misfortune was borne with great composure by the father, whose atheistical opinion it was said was, that a wise man may dispose of himself and make his life as short as he pleases. By his wife, a French lady of the name of Rambouillet, the son had two daughters, to whom he left his property, provided they did not marry Frenchmen. The works of sir William are valuable, and consist of Memoirs of Public Affairs during his public employments — Letters — Miscellanies — Observations on the United Provinces of the Netherlands, 2 vols. folio, &c.

TEMPLEMAN, Peter, M. D. a physician, born at Dorchester, Dorsetshire, 17th March, 1711, and educated at the Charter-house, from whence he went to Trinity college, Cambridge. After taking his first degrees, he went to Leyden, where for two years he studied medicine under Boerhaave, and other celebrated professors, and in 1739 returned to London. Though he settled in London with the intention to practise, yet he was of too indolent a disposition to succeed, and his fondness for literature, and the company of men of science and erudition, left him little time to pursue his original plan. In 1753 he was appointed keeper of the reading room of the British museum, which he resigned in 1760, when elected secretary to the new society of arts. He died of an asthma, 23d Sept. 1769. He was a man of great erudition, and published a translation of Norden's Travels in Egypt — Curious Remarks on Physic, Anatomy, &c. extracted from the memoirs of the French academy of sciences, &c. — besides some poetical pieces.

TEMPLEMAN, Thomas, a writing-master of Bury, Suffolk, who published engraved tables, with calculations of the number of square feet and population of the kingdoms of the world, folio.

TENCIN, Peter Guerin de, a native of Grenoble, who was educated at Paris, and embracing the ecclesiastical profession, became grand vicar of Sens. He went in 1721 with cardinal de Bissy to Rome, and after the election of Innocent XIII. to the papedom, he remained in that capital as the envoy of France. His services were rewarded by the archbishopric of Embrun, and in 1739 he was raised to the purple, and soon after made archbishop of Lyons, and prime minister of France in the room of Fleury. This high distinction was not suited to the talents of the new cardinal, who, though he might possess the abilities or the intrigues necessary for an inferior station, was devoid of that firmness, that intelligence, and that unshaken integrity which should adorn the prime minister of a mighty empire. He retired soon after from the helm of affairs, and lived in privacy in his diocese, where he died 1758, aged 80.

TENCIN, Claudine Alexandrine Guerfi de, sister of cardinal Tencin, was born at Grenoble, and took the religious habit at the monastery of Montfleuri. Tired of a religious life, she obtained the pope's permission to quit it, and she came to Paris, and launched into all the extravagances and foibles of the gay world. In consequence of the death of la Frefnaye, a counsellor of state, who was said to be murdered in her chamber, she was thrust into the Chatelet prison, and then into the Bastille, from which she was liberated soon after. She died at Paris, 1749, advanced in years. She wrote the Siege of Calais, a romance of merit — Memoirs of Comminges — les Malheurs de l'Amour, &c.

TENIERS, David, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, 1582. He learned the rudiments of his art under Rubens, and then travelled to Rome, and studied under Adam Elsheimer. He afterwards returned to Antwerp, where he died 1649. His pieces are much admired for their expression, and contain entertaining scenes taken from country fairs, drinking parties, merry making, chemists, &c. He was called old Teniers to distinguish him from his son David, who also excelled as a painter. Young Teniers died at Antwerp, 1694, aged 84. His pieces are highly esteemed. They consist of fairs, drinking and smoking parties, laboratories, &c. but are superior to those of his father in harmony, union, and correctness. Young David was patronized by the prince of Orange, and the archduke Leopold of Austria. He had a brother, Abraham, who was also a painter, and chiefly excelled in the knowledge of the chiaro oscuro.

TENISON, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, 29th Sept. 1636, and educated at Norwich school, from which he went to Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. Here he became fellow, and took his degrees regularly, and in the first part of his life, during the prevalence of fanaticism, he studied physic, but afterwards applied to divinity. He was presented to the rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, by lord Manchester, and in 1680 he obtained the vicarage of St. Martin in the fields, London. During the reign of Charles II. and his successor, he was an active and zealous writer against popery, and in consequence of his services in favor of the revolution, he was made archdeacon of London by William, 1689, and in 1691 nominated to the see of Lincoln, and on the death of Tillotson, 1694, promoted to Canterbury. Distinguished as a parish priest by his benevolence and liberality, and an assiduous care of his Christian calling, he continued, at the head of the church, the same zeal, mingled with moderation, firmness, and exemplary piety. He died at Lambeth, 14th Dec. 1715, about one year after his wife, daughter of Dr. Love, of Benet college. He published some sermons — the Creed of Hobbes examined, &c. — Baconiana, or Remains of Sir Francis Bacon, 8vo. — some tracts, &c.

TENTZELIUS, Andrew, an eminent German physician, in the 17th century, author of a treatise on Mummies, &c.

TENTZELIUS, William Ernest, a native of Arnstadt, Thuringia. He devoted himself to literature, and struggled with unusual resignation against the evils of poverty. He died 1707, aged 49. He wrote Saxonia Numismatica, 4 vols. 4to. — Supplementum Historiæ Gothanæ, 3 vols. 4to. works of great merit.

TERBURGH, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born at Zwol near Overijssel 1608. He travelled over Europe, and was much noticed and encouraged, especially at the court of Spain, where he was knighted. He settled at Deventer, where he became a magistrate, and died 1681. His subjects are chiefly conversations, persons engaged in games, and other humorous adventures, much inferior however to the performances of Douw, or Mieris.

TERENCE, Publius, an African slave, in the service of Terentius Lucanus. By the kindness of his master he obtained his liberty, and soon distinguished himself as an elegant writer of comedies. By his industry some of the best Greek comedies appeared in a Latin dress; but of all these only six remain, deservedly admired for delicacy of sentiment, and purity of expression. He was drowned as is supposed in coming from Greece, B. C. 159.

TERPANDER, a poet and musician of Lesbos, who added three to the four strings of the lyre, B. C. 675.

TERRASSON, John, a French writer, born at Lyons 1670, and admitted into the congregation of the oratory, which he afterwards left. By the friendship of Bignon, he procured a place in the academy of sciences 1707, and in 1721, was elected professor of the college royal in Greek, Latin, and philosophy. He died 1750, respected according to Voltaire, as a good practical philosopher. He wrote a dissertation against the Iliad, 2 vols. 12mo. during the dispute between la Motte, and Madame Dacier, about Homer, — Sethos, a learned political and moral romance, translated into English — a translation of Diodorus Siculus into French with notes and prefaces, an excellent work in 7 vols. 12mo. — Reflections in favor of Law's Mississippi Project, &c. — His brother Andrew was also a priest of the oratory, and died at Paris, 1723, author of sermons in 4 vols. 8vo. much admired. Gaspard another brother, was also of the oratory, but quitted it. He also published sermons and died 1752.

TERRASSON, Mathew, a French lawyer, born at Lyons 13th Aug. 1669. He studied law at Paris, and acquired great reputation in the provincial courts. Besides some contributions to the Journal des Savans, he wrote discourses, pleadings, memoirs, &c. published together in 4to. He died at Paris 30th Sep. 1734, aged 66.

TERRASSON, Anthony, son of the preceding, was also distinguished as an advocate. He was born at Paris 1st Nov. 1705. He wrote at the request of the chancellor Aguesseau, the history of Roman Jurisprudence, published, folio 1750, and for this useful and judicious work he was made censor royal, counsellor to the assembly of Dombes, and afterwards advocate to the French clergy, and professor to the royal college. He wrote besides miscellanies in history, literature, &c.

literature, jurisprudence, criticism &c. 12mo. &c. and died 30th Oct. 1782, aged 77, without issue.

TERRAY, Joseph Marie, a native of Boen near Roanne, who by his merits rose to places of honor and trust in the French government. He was made comptroller general, minister of state, and director general of buildings; and in times of difficulty he maintained his character of integrity, loyalty, and patriotism. He recommended to the monarch, not the laying of fresh taxes on the already overloaded people, but to suppress abuses, to introduce reform and economy, and to make the expences equal to the resources of the state. He retired in 1774 from public affairs, respected by the virtuous, but hated by those who live upon the distresses of the public, and grow rich by the profusion and the extravagance of the government. He died at Paris, 18th Feb. 1778, aged 63. His collection Des Comptes Rendus, from 1758 to 1787, has been published. His nephew who was intendant of Lyons, was dragged with his wife to the guillotine, at Paris 1793, on the accusation that he had suffered his children to emigrate and to bear arms against the republic.

TERTRE, Francis Joachim Duport du, a French writer, born at St. Maloes' 1715. He was of the society of Jesuits, among whom he was professor of the learned languages. He died 1759. He wrote an Abridgment of the history of England, 3 vols. 12mo. a work of some merit, — an history of famous Conspiracies, 10 vols. 12mo. — abridgment of the History of Spain, 5 vols. 12mo. — L'Almanach des Beaux Arts, &c.

TERTRE, John Baptist, a native of Calais, who after serving his country in the military and naval service, became a Dominican, and set out as missionary into America. After a zealous discharge of his mission he returned to Europe 1658, and died at Paris 1687. He wrote a general history of the Antilles belonging to the French, 4 vols. 4to. 1667, and 1671, a work accurate, though not elegantly written. There was a Jesuit of that name, Rodolphus, a native of Alençon, who died 1762, aged 95. He was author of some works on religious subjects, and refuted Malebranche's Metaphysics.

TERTULLIAN, Q. Septim. Florus, one of the fathers of the church, was born at Carthage. When converted to Christianity he came to Rome, and produced his famous apology for the christians during the persecution of Severus. He died about 216.

TERWESTEN, Augustin, a Dutch painter. He was born at the Hague, and studied the works of the best masters in Italy. By his influence the academy of painting was revived at the Hague, and that of Berlin was established. He died at Berlin where he had been deservedly patronized 1711, aged 72. His brothers Matthew and Elias, were also eminent painters. The first excelled in the representation of fruits and flowers, and died 1724, and the latter was admired for his valuable historical pieces. He died 1735.

TESTA, Peter, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Lucca 1659. He studied at Rome, under Dominichino, and showed great attachment to his art, though his subjects were not always correct, nor his execution chaste. He was drowned in the Tiber 1650, while endeavouring to recover his hat, which had been blown into the water, whilst he was engaged in taking a landscape.

TESTELIN, Louis, a painter, born at Paris. He studied under Vouet, and distinguished himself by his historical pieces. His restoration of Tabitha to life, and the scourging of Paul and Silas were the best of his compositions. He died at Paris 1655, aged 40. His brother Henry also excelled as a painter, and was on account of his merits patronized by the French king. He died 1696, aged 80. He was, as well as his brother, member of the French academy.

TESTI, Fulvio, an Italian poet, born at Ferrara. He became prime minister to Francis duke of Modena, but after enjoying the favor of his master he fell under his displeasure and ended his days in confinement in a fortress 1646. He wrote odes and other poems, printed Venice 1656, 2 vols. 12mo. He was a successful imitator of the best writers of Greece and Rome, and was called by his countrymen the Italian Horace.

TESTZEL, John, a native of Pirn on the Elbe. He became a Dominican, and was empowered by the archbishop of Mayence, to publish the indulgences granted by pope Leo X. for the completion of St. Peter's church at Rome. The zeal with which this holy father executed his commission, drew upon him the attacks of Luther, and at last became the cause of the reformation. Not only in the monasteries, but in taverns and even brothels, these indulgences for the remission of sins were to be bought, and whoever contributed to the filling of the purse of the holy see might be permitted to riot in the greatest debauchery, and even, as Testzel said, might offer violence to the holy virgin, and be forgiven by the power of the pope, whose arms were equal to the cross of Christ. When this bigoted preacher was reproached by Militius as being the cause of all the disasters of the church in Germany, he was so afflicted with the imputation that he died of a broken heart 1519.

TEXTOR, Vid. TEXIER.

THAIS a celebrated courtesan of Corinth, who persuaded Alexander the Great to set Persepolis on fire. She afterwards married Ptolemy king of Egypt.

THALES, a famous philosopher of Miletus, who improved himself by travelling, and deserved to be the first of the seven wise men. He first observed the apparent diameter of the sun, and divided the year into 365 days. He also was able to predict eclipses, and died B. C. 545.

THELLUSON, Peter, a native of Geneva, who settled as a merchant in London, where he acquired, by his industry and labor, an enormous fortune. He died at his seat at Plaſtow, Kent, 21st July 1797, leaving 3 sons and 3 daughters. From an ambitious desire of posthumous fame, he left his property in an extraordinary manner. To his wife and children he left about 100,000l. and the rest, amounting to upwards of 500,000l. he leaves to trustees to accumulate till the male children of his sons and grandsons are dead. This distant period may extend to 120 years, in which case the property will then amount to 140 millions, and if then he should have no lineal descendants, this astonishing property is to go to the use of the country for the benefit of the sinking fund. This extraordinary will was disputed by his surviving family, but it was affirmed by a solemn decree of chancery, though afterwards an act was passed, by the means of chancellor Roslyn, to prevent the recurrence of so extravagant a desire of private accumulation.

THEMISIUS, a Paphlagonian philosopher in the 4th century, made prefect of Constantinople by Theodosius. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle and Plato, and died 410, A. D.

THEMISON, an ancient physician, author of the first called Methodists in Medicine before the Christian era.

THEMISTOCLES, an illustrious Athenian general. He was brave in war, and in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, his prudence and perseverance contributed to the naval battle and victory of Salamis. After strengthening and improving the resources of his country, he was treated with suspicion and ingratitude by his fellow citizens, and sought an asylum in the territories of his Persian enemies. He died at Magnesia 449 B. C. aged 65.

THEOBALD, Lewis, the editor of Shakespeare, was born at Sittingbourne, Kent, and educated at Islington. He studied the law, which he soon relinquished for poetry. He was for some time engaged in the Censor published in Mist's journal, and by his severe censure on the wits of the age, drew down their resentment upon his own head. Pope made him the hero of his Dunciad, but afterwards bestowed the honor on another character. He, in 1720, introduced on the stage the Double Falsehood as the production of Shakespeare, which was attacked by Pope and other critics. He wrote in 1726, Shakespeare Restored, and besides above 20 dramatic pieces of little merit. He is chiefly known as the editor of Shakespeare's plays, 8 vols. labors which, though abused by some critics, and especially Warburton, are not devoid of merit. He died 1742.

THEOCRITUS, a famous Greek poet of Syracuse, patronized by Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote Idyllia, in a very interesting style of sweetness and simplicity, besides epigrams.

THEODATUS, king of the Goths, was placed on the throne of Italy by his aunt Amalasonta whom he married, and afterwards destroyed. He was defeated by Belisarius, the general of Justinian, and then put to death by his own soldiers, A. D. 536.

THEODORE, king of Corsica, was son of Anthony, baron de Newhoff and de Stein, in Westphalia. He was born 1696 at Metz, where his father then held an office at the court of Lorraine, having left his country in consequence of marrying a merchant's daughter against the wishes of his family. Young Theodore was for some time in the suite of baron Gortz, the Swedish minister, but after his execution he left the Swedish for the Spanish service. He afterwards visited France, Holland, and England, and in 1736 landed in Corsica, while the inhabitants of that island were in a state of rebellion against their tyrannical masters, the Genoese. His character for boldness and enterprise was such that he was treated with unusual respect by the heads of the insurrection, and as he had brought with him supplies of arms and money, he was soon regarded as the future deliverer of the oppressed Corsicans, and solemnly declared king of the island, 15th April 1736. In this new capacity he displayed great vigor; though denounced as a traitor by the Genoese, he collected an army of 25,000 men, and laid siege to Bastia, which he took. Assistance from abroad was also expected, to give weight and consequence to his measures; and to render his power more united, he established a military order, called the Order of Deliverance, but his popularity at last began to vanish when the promised succours from France and England did not arrive. His subjects grew dissatisfied, and threatened to reduce him to a private station; but Theodore, not trusting to the negotiations of ambassadors, determined in person to solicit the crowned heads of Europe for assistance, and after appointing a regency of 47 to manage the public affairs in his absence, he left the island. He now travelled in disguise, but when he reached Paris, he was ordered to leave the kingdom; and after retiring to Amsterdam where he met with some protection, he embarked for the Mediterranean, but was soon after seized at Naples, and imprisoned in the fortress of Cueta. His circumstances were now so desperate, that when he regained his liberty, he could not venture to visit his subjects, but fled to England for an asylum. His creditors prosecuted him also in England, and in the midst of his distresses, though a charitable contribution was made for his relief, he was thrown into the king's-bench prison, from which in 1756 he extricated himself by the privilege of an act of insolvency, after registering his kingdom for the benefit of his creditors at Guild-hall. He died soon after, Dec. 11, 1756, at the house of his taylor, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Anne's, Westminster. In 1757 a marble monument was erected to his memory, by Horace Walpole, with these concluding lines:

The grave, great teacher, to a level brings Heroes and beggars, galley-slaves and kings.
But Theodore this moral learned, ere dead,
Fate poured its lesson on his living head;
Bestowed a kingdom, and denied him bread.

THEODORET, a father of the church, deposed from his bishopric, by the council of Ephesus, but restored by the assembly of Chalcedon. He died about 460. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, lives of saints, commentaries, &c.

THEODORIC, first king of the Goths in Italy, was the natural son of Theodimir, king of the Ostrogoths. He was given up as an hostage by Welamir, his father's brother, to the emperor Leo I. 461, and he distinguished himself by the importance of his services to Zeno, who had been driven from his throne by Basiliscus. He became consul 484, and was sent by the emperor to Italy, against Odoacer, whom he defeated and put to death. Thus become master of all Italy, he strengthened his power by marrying, in 509, the sister of Clovis, king of France, and by making a treaty of alliance with Anastasius, emperor of the East, and with the Vandals of Africa. In the enjoyment of peace he devoted himself to the improvement of his dominions, and to the happiness of his people, and his noble plans were warmly and ably seconded by his active secretary, the celebrated Cassiodorus. New edi-edifices were raised to beautify Rome; her walls were repaired, and Pavia and Ravenna also equally shared the kindness of their munificent prince. While, however, he promoted commerce, encouraged the arts, and patronized literature, Theodoric grew suspicious and cruel, and he caused to be put to death Symmachus and Boethius, two of the most illustrious of his subjects. This inhumanity, it is said, preyed upon his mind, and he died soon after, under the severest tortures of conscience, 30th Aug. 526.

THEODORUS, a bishop of Cilicia, who died 428. His works were condemned by a general council, as heretical. His commentaries on the psalms, &c. are extant.

THEODOSIUS, a noble Roman, raised for his valor, and services, to a share of the imperial throne, by Gratian. When sole emperor he waged successful war against the Goths; but he disgraced himself in causing the people of Thessalonica to be put to the sword, a cruel action, which drew down upon him the censures of St. Ambrose, and exclusion from the church till he made due atonement for the crime. He afterwards defeated the barbarians that invaded Thrace, and proved equally fortunate in his war against Maximus and Eugenius. He died at Milan, 395.

THEODOSIUS II. grandson of the preceding, succeeded his father Arcadius on the imperial throne, 408. Though a weak prince, he defeated the Persians on the borders of the Euphrates; but in his expedition against the Huns, he was obliged to purchase a dubious peace. He married Eudocia, the daughter of the philosopher Leontius, and died 450.

THEODOTUS, a tanner of Byzantium, who abandoned the Christian faith to save his life, under the persecution of M. Aurelius. His apostacy drew down upon him the censures of the church, and in consequence he became the founder of a new sect, which denied the divinity of Christ. Another of that name became the head of the Melchisedeckians, who supposed that the Messiah was inferior to Melchisedeck.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet of Megara, of whose works only a few fragments remain. He flourished B. C. 544.

THEON, a Greek sophist, author of a treatise on rhetoric, edited Leyden, 1726, 8vo.

THEON, a mathematician of Alexandria in the age of the great Theodosius. His Commentary on Euclid was printed Oxford, 1672, in 4to.

THEOPHANES, George, a native of Constantinople, known as an historian, and as an ecclesiastic at the seventh general council. He was banished into Samothrace by the jealousy of Leo the Armenian, and died there 818. He is author of a chronicle, extending from the period where Syncellus finishes, to the reign of Michael Curopalatus, of which the best edition is that of the Louvre, 1655, folio.

THEOPHANES, Prokopovitch, a Russian historian of eminence, born at Kiof, 9th June, 1681. After studying under his uncle, the rector of a convent school; the learned languages, he went to Rome, where he imbibed a taste for the fine arts and works of genius. He returned to Kiof, and assumed the monastic habit, and became professor of philosophy. He was noticed by Peter the Great, attended him in his campaigns, and, under his direction, was employed in reforming the clergy, and abolishing the patriarchal dignity. His services were duly rewarded; he was made bishop of Plescof, and under Catherine, raised to the dignity of metropolitan of all Russia, as the archbishop of Novogorod. He died 1736. Besides sermons, disquisitions, and a treatise on rhetoric, he wrote, a Life of Peter the Great, which terminates at the battle of Pultowa, a most candid and valuable performance.

THEOPHILUS, archbishop of Antioch, the first who used the word Trinity, to express the three persons in the Godhead. He flourished in the second century, and wrote a Defence of Christianity.

THEOPHRASTUS, a Greek philosopher of Lesbos, educated under Plato and Aristotle. He was a popular teacher, and had not less than 2000 pupils. His works have been best published by Heinsius, Leyden, 1613, folio.

THEOPHYLACT, a native of Constantinople, metropolitan of Bulgaria, in the 11th century. He was author of Commentaries on the Gospels, and Acts, and also the Prophets, and the Epistles, &c.

THERAMENES, an Athenian philosopher, one of the 30 tyrants appointed over Athens by Sparta. He was condemned to death by Critias, because he refused to assent to the violent and cruel measures of his colleagues, and took poison, B. C. 403.

THERMES, Paul de la Barthe, lord of, a native of Conserans, who early devoted himself to arms and served under Francis I. and his two successors. The victory of Cerisoles, in 1544, was attributed to his great valor, and he acquired fresh glory at the taking of Saluces and Ravel. He afterwards passed into Scotland, to invade the English territories, and in 1551, was sent as ambassador to Rome, and soon after he headed the French forces in Italy. His capture of Dunkirk, and of St. Venox, was followed by his defeat at the battle of Gravelines, in which he was taken prisoner. The peace of 1559 set him at liberty, and he died at Paris, 6th May, 1562, aged 80, without posterity.

THESPIAS, a Greek poet of Attica, called the inventor of tragedy, B. C. 536. His theatre was a cart dragged from town to town, where two men with be-smeared faces, entertained the people with uncouth dialogues and rustic songs.

THEVENOT, Melchisedec, librarian to the king of France, was born in Paris, 1621. He was actuated, from his youth, with the strongest desire of seeing foreign countries, and from the voyages published by others, as well as from his own personal observations, he gave to the world his voyages and travels. His account of an Instrument, for ascertaining the longitude, and the declination of the needle, is considered as the best part of these books. Thevenot was, for some time, ambassador of France, at Constantinople, and also assisted at the conclave assembled after the death of Innocent X. and was afterwards envoy at Genoa. He died of a slow fever, Oct. 1691. He was a curious collector of rare and valuable books and manuscripts, but the most noble part of his library, was the marbles presented ed to him by M. Nointel, with bas reliefs, and inscriptions, two thousand years old. His travels have been translated into English. He wrote also the Art of Swimming, 12mo.

THEVENOT, John, another traveller of reputation, who died 1667. It is said that he was the first person who brought coffee to Paris. He travelled into Asia, of which an account was published, 3 vols. 4to. and at Amsterdam, 1727, 5 vols. 12mo.

THIELIN, John Philip, a painter of Mechlin, born 1618. Though of noble birth, and a man of considerable fortune, he studied painting under Daniel Segers, and produced some beautiful pieces for the king of Spain. His flowers were particularly admired, as painted with native delicacy, and grouped with taste. His three daughters were also eminent as artists.

THIERRY I. king of France, third son of Clovis, II., ascended the throne of Neustria, and Burgundy, 670, by the interest of Ebroin, the mayor of the palace, by whom he suffered himself to be governed. He was defeated at Testri in Vermandois, by Pepin, of Austrasia, and he died four years after, 691, aged 39. He is called by Henault, the third of that name.

THIERRY II. or IV. son of Dagobert III. was taken from a cloister, to ascend the throne of France. He was a king only in name, as his minister Charles Martel governed the kingdom at pleasure. He died 737, aged 25.

THIERRY I. son of Clovis I., obtained as his share of the kingdom of France, the kingdom of Austrasia, of which he made Metz the capital. The best part of his reign was occupied in repelling the invasion of the Danes, and in quarrels with his brother Chilbert, king of Paris. He died 534, aged about 51, after a reign of 23 years.

THIERRY II. second son of Chilbert, was king of Burgundy and Austrasia. He was engaged in disputes with his brother Theodebert, in consequence of the intrigues of his mother-in-law, Brunehaut, and at last he took him prisoner, and suffered him to be cruelly put to death. He was afterwards reconciled to Brunehaut, at whose instigation, he had disgraced himself by the murder of his brother, but this inhuman prince, soon after, caused him to be poisoned, 613.

THIERRY, of Niem, a native of Paderborn, in Westphalia, who was secretary to the popes at Rome, and was employed by them at the council of Trent. He died 1417. He wrote history of the schisms of the popes, fol. and other works now little known.

THIERRY, Henry, a printer of eminence at Paris, in the 15th century. His family became celebrated in France for several generations as printers, and some most valuable works at various times have issued from their press. One of their descendants who was bookseller to Boileau, and was immortalized by the poet, in his epistle to his verses, died at Paris, 1712.

THIERS, John Baptist, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Chartres, 1636. He was professor of belles lettres, at Paris, and afterwards curate of Vibray, in the Mans, and of Champrond, in the diocese of Chartres. He died Feb. 28, 1703. He wrote, a treatise on Superstitions, concerning the Sacraments — de Fæstorum Dierum Immunitione Lib. — and other things, besides the History of Perukes, a curious book, in which he says the year 1629 was the epoch of Perukes in France, and that no clergyman wore them before 1660.

THIRLBY, Styan, an able critic, born at Leicester, 1692. He was of Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of L. L. D. but the most promising abilities were clouded by great indolence of disposition, a quarrelsome temper, and a strong fondness for intemperate drinking. He studied physic, and afterwards applied himself to the civil law, and then the common law, but with this he soon grew dissatisfied, and at last obtained a sinecure place of about 100l. a year as king's waiter in the port of London, by the interest of his friend sir Edward Walpole, who had been his pupil. For some time he resided in the house of his friend, but he rendered himself disagreeable by keeping a journal of whatever he observed or heard in the family, incompatible with his unfocial ideas, and he spent the remainder of his life in private lodgings, where he died, Dec. 19, 1753. He wrote some notes on Shakespeare's plays, which appear in Johnson's edition, but he is chiefly known as the author of an able tract against Whiston on the Trinity, and as the publisher of a valuable edition of Justin's works, fol. 1723, the dedication to which is considered as a masterly production.

THOMAS, St. surnamed Didymus, was a Galilean, and one of the apostles of the Redeemer. When after the resurrection, he disbelieved the appearance of his master, he was convinced of the truth, and required by our blessed Lord to examine his wounds, and to put his finger into the print of the nails, upon which he expressed his belief by the exclamation of, my Lord, and my God! After the ascension he went to Parthia, to preach the gospel, and penetrated into the eastern countries as far as India, where it is said that he suffered martyrdom.

THOMAS, an obscure individual, from a common soldier obtained the command of the troops of Leo, the Armenian, after whose death he aspired to the throne of the Cæsars. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, but was soon after defeated by Michael the successor of Leo, who caused him to be impaled alive, 823.

THOMAS, James Ernest, a native of Hagelstein, who studied painting in Italy and was the friend and imitator of Esheimer. His landscapes possessed great merit. He died 1653, aged 65.

THOMAS, William, D. D. bishop of Worcester, was born at Bristol, 2d Feb. 1613. He was educated at Czermarthen school, and then entered at St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed to Jesus, of which society he became fellow. He was then chaplain to the earl of Northumberland, from whom he obtained the vicarage of Laugharn, and Lansedunon rectory, and during the troublesome times of civil war, he continued here to discharge his duties, and became an active and benevolent parish priest. At last, however, he was deprived of his living by the parliament, and had in consequence to struggle with many difficulties and with poverty, till the restoration replaced him in the confidence of the government and the the possession of his living. He was afterwards chaplain to the duke of York, and made dean of Worcester 1665, and in 1677, raised to the see of St. David's. In this diocese he rendered himself popular by his affability and attention, he often preached in Welsh, and gained the good opinion of his clergy, but his attempts to remove the cathedral of his diocese from the unfrequented town of St. David's, to the more populous and commercial town of Caermarthen, proved abortive. In 1683, he was translated to Worcester, where he behaved with exemplary attention towards his clergy, and promoted the prosperity of his diocese. In 1687, he entertained the king in his progress through the county, grieved indeed at the sight of his popish attendants, but hospitably respectful to him as became a subject. On William's accession he was unwilling to take the oaths to the new monarch, and prepared to resign all his preferments, and to retire to the house of his friend Martin, vicar of Wolverly. He died, however, before the time fixed for his departure, of a violent fit of the gout, 25th June, 1689. He was buried in the cloisters of his cathedral. By his wife, who died 1677, he had eight children, four sons and four daughters, but only two survived him. Respectable as a man and as a prelate, he was also a good writer, but more nervous than elegant. He wrote an Apology for the Church of England, 1678-9, 8vo. — Letter to the Clergy — some sermons — Roman Oracles Silenced, published after his death.

THOMAS, William, grandson of the bishop, by John Thomas and Mary Bagnall, was born 1670, and was educated at Westminster school, from whence, in 1688, he was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees. By the interest of lord Somers he obtained the living of Exal in Warwickshire, and in 1721, he removed to Worcester for the better education of his family, which consisted of nine daughters and five sons. In 1723, he was presented by bishop Hough to the rectory of St. Nicholas, Worcester, and died July, 26, 1738. He was buried in the cloisters of the cathedral near his grandfather. He was distinguished as a man of letters and as a good antiquary. He published Antiquitates Prioratus Majoris Malverne — Dugdale's Warwickshire improved, 2 vols. fol. 1730 — a Survey of Worcester Cathedral, and prepared materials for a history of Worcestershire, which have been handsomely noticed by Dr. Nash.

THOMAS, Elizabeth, better known by the name of Corinna, was born 1675. She was known as a writer of considerable abilities, but her misfortunes arose in the death of Mr. Gwynnet, to whom she was to have been married, 1711. After this, ill health and affliction were her constant companions, and she sunk into the grave 3d Feb. 1730, and was buried in St. Bride's church. She incurred the severest displeasure of Pope, because she had suffered Curl the bookseller to publish some of the poet's letters with those of Henry Cromwell, and for this offence she was placed in a conspicuous situation in the Dunciad. Her poems were published after her death, together with 2 vols. of letters which passed between her and her lover Gwynnet.

THOMAS, Anthony Leonard, a member of the French academy, distinguished as a writer and a poet. He was born at Clermont in Auvergne, 1732, and educated with great care by his mother. He was intended for the law, but his abilities were called into action by the offer of a professorship in the college of Beauvais at Paris, which was more congenial with his disposition. He rose gradually by his merit, and was at last secretary to the duke of Orleans. He died of a fever 17th Sep. 1785, at the house of the archbishop of Lyons, and was buried in the village of Oulins. Respected and beloved as a man, he was highly esteemed as a writer. In 1756, he published his reflections, historical and literary, on Voltaire's poem of natural religion, in which he ably defended christianity. In 1759, his eulogy of marshal Saxe was crowned by the academy, and he deserved public applause also by his eulogies on d'Aguesseau, Du Guay Trouin, Des Cartes, Sully, and Marcus Aurelius. He wrote also an Essay on Elogies, 2 vols. 12mo. — an Essay on the Character, Manners, and Mind of Females, 8vo. and some poems, and he was at his death engaged on a poem on Peter the Great. His works were published together 1802, 7 vols. 8vo. Paris.

THOMASIUS, James, a native of Leipzig, of an ancient family. He became there professor of eloquence, belles lettres, and philosophy, and had among his pupils the celebrated Leibnitz. He was a man of mild manners and great benevolence of heart, and he died 1684, aged 62, at Leipzig. He wrote the Origin of Philosophical and Ecclesiastical History — several dissertations, &c. all in Latin in 11 vols. 8vo. His son Christian was born at Leipzig, and took his doctor's degree at Frankfort on the Oder 1676. He published a German journal, which drew upon him in consequence of the severity of some of his remarks, the displeasure of government, and he retired to Berlin, and was made by the king of Prussia first professor of law, in the newly founded university of Halle. He attracted much of the public attention by asserting in a thesis that concubinage is not contrary to the laws of God. He died 1728, aged 73. He wrote an Introduction to the Philosophy of the Court — History of Wisdom and Folly — on the Defects of the Roman Jurisprudence, &c.

THOMPSON, Edward, a native of Hull in Yorkshire. He was educated under Dr. Cox at Hampstead, and early went to the East Indies. He was afterwards pressed into the navy, and by his good conduct rose, in 1757, to the rank of lieutenant. At the conclusion of the war he retired on half pay, and then turned his thoughts to literary pursuits. He published successively the Meretriciad, a licentious poem — the Soldier, a poem, 4to. 1764 — the Courtezan, and the Demirep, two poems, 1765 — and Sailors' letters, 2 vols. 12mo. 1767. His Trinculo's trip to the Jubilee, a ludicrous performance, in which he gave an account of the jubilee celebrated at Stratford on Avon, in honor of Shakespeare, appeared in 1769, and also his Court of Cupid, 2 vols. which contained a collection of the immoral pieces which he had already obtruded upon the world. He altered the Fair Quaker from Shadwell, in 1773, and produced it on the Drury-

Drury-lane stage, with some effect, and he afterwards published Paul Whitehead's works, and also Marvell's, 3 vols. 4to. On the breaking out of the American war he obtained by the interest of Garrick a captain's commission, and the command of the Hydra, in which he had the good fortune to capture a valuable French East India-man. He died in 1786, on the coast of Africa, on board the Grampus, a ship to which he had been appointed the preceding year. He published proposals for maritime observations, collected from 1753 to 1763, but the work never appeared.

THOMSON, James, a celebrated English poet, son of a Scotch minister, and born at Ednam in Roxburghshire, 11th Sep. 1700. He was educated at Jedburgh school, and then entered at the university of Edinburgh. He here distinguished himself by the elegance and spirit of his compositions, and when he had been directed by the divinity professor, Hamilton, to write an exercise on a psalm, descriptive of the greatness and majesty of God, his paraphrase was much admired for its fire and its poetical beauties. He then studied divinity, but soon relinquished it, as he considered the profession too confined for the expansion of his abilities. He determined to seek in London the patronage which might be extended to merit, and the publication of his "Winter," 1726, soon introduced him to the notice of the great and of the learned. By the friendship of Dr. Rundle, afterwards bishop of Derry, he was recommended to lord chancellor Talbot, and attended his son as a companion in his travels on the continent. The popularity of "Winter," produced Summer in 1727, Spring 1728, and Autumn in 1730; and other pieces were also published to prove the diligence, the patriotism, and the creative powers of the poet. The death of his noble pupil was soon after followed by that of the chancellor, and Thomson was thus reduced from a state of comfort and independence, to a narrow and precarious subsistence. The place of secretary of the briefs which he had obtained from the chancellor, fell at his death, yet the generosity of his friends was kindly exerted, he was by the recommendation of lord Lyttelton noticed and patronized with a pension by the prince of Wales, and by the influence of the same noble friend he obtained in 1746, the office of surveyor general of the Leeward islands. He died of a fever 27th Aug. 1748, and was buried in Richmond church, Surrey. His executors were lord Lyttelton and Mr. Mitchel. Besides his seasons, Thomson wrote an elegant poem to the memory of sir Isaac Newton, 1727 — Britannia, a political poem, occasioned by the quarrels of the Spaniards with England, with respect to America — Liberty, a poem in five books, containing ancient and modern Italy compared, Greece, Rome, Britain, the Prospect — the Castle of Indolence, an allegorical poem, after Spenser's manner — besides some tragedies which were received on the stage with reiterated and deserved applause — Agamemnon, acted 1738 — Edward and Eleanor, a tragedy, not acted in consequence of the dispute between the prince of Wales his patron and the king — the Masque of Alfred, written jointly with Mallet — Tancred and Sigismunda, from Gil Blas, acted 1745 — and Coriolanus, acted after his death for the benefit of his sisters. Thomson in private life was an amiable, pious, and benevolent character, with great goodness of heart and the most virtuous disposition. As a poet he possessed powers and perfections peculiarly his own. His Seasons display the most glowing, animated, and interesting, descriptions of nature, in language at once elegant, simple and dignified. They bring before us, as is well observed, the whole magnificence of nature, whether pleasing or dreadful. The gaiety of spring, the splendor of summer, the tranquillity of autumn, and the horrors of winter, take each in turn the possession of our minds. In the midst of a florid and luxuriant flow of imagery, some exuberances perhaps may be found by the fastidious critic, but the merits of the poet are built on too solid a foundation to be shaken, and while the delightful changes of the varied year continue to convey pleasure to the eye, so long must the verse of the poet entertain the mind with the most seducing powers of well managed description and of animated portraiture. The works of the poet have been edited in various forms.

THORESBY, Ralph, an eminent antiquary, born at Leeds, Yorkshire, 1658. As his father was a merchant, he was intended for the mercantile line, and was in consequence sent to Rotterdam to learn the Dutch and French languages. On the death of his father 1680, he succeeded to his business, but he paid at the same time great attention to the study of history and to antiquarian researches. Though bred among the presbyterians, he was induced by reflection to conform to the rites of the church, and to participate in her sacraments. He was not only a learned man, but the friend of the learned, and to his kindness and communications the most respectable writers of the times, have acknowledged themselves, such as Gibson, Walker, Calamy, Collins, Lister, Gale, Hearne, &c. He died 1725, aged 68, and was buried in St. Peter's church, at Leeds. He was fellow of the Royal society, and wrote Ducatus Leodienfis, or the topography of Leeds, and the parts adjacent, with a catalogue of the antiquities and curiosities of his cabinet. He intended to publish a view of the state of the Northern parts of the kingdom, in the times of the Romans and Britons, but his age prevented the completion, and his history of the church of Leeds alone, as a part, appeared 1724, containing an account of some remarkable characters, Matthew Hutton, Edwyn Sandys, Tobie Matthews, John Thoresby, archbishop of York, &c.

THORIUS, Raphael, a physician, much admired at the court of James I. He was a French protestant, and was remarkable for his learning, but more for his love of wine. He died of the plague in London, 1629. He wrote a poem on tobacco, published, 12mo. 1644, and a letter de Causâ Morbi & Mortis II. Causaboni.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, an able divine, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B. D. He obtained the mastership of Sidney college 1643, but was soon dispossessed for his attachment to the royal cause. His sufferings during the civil wars, were rewarded at the restoration by the gift of a prebend of Westminster. He wrote Epilogus, fol. in which he ably defends the tenets of the church of England — treatises on Weights and Measures — on Ecclesiastical Censures, and he also assisted Walton in the completion of his Polyglott bible. He died 1672.

THORNHILL, for James, an eminent painter, born 1676. Though of a respectable family in Dorsetshire, his circumstances were low through the ill conduct of his father, but by the friendship of his uncle Dr. Sydenham, he was enabled to attend to his favorite pursuit, painting. He travelled on the continent, and there greatly improved himself, and made a valuable collection of some of the pieces of the best masters. His merits were noticed by the great; queen Anne entrusted to his care the beautifying the dome of St. Paul's with the history of that saint, which he executed in a grand style on eight pannels; and his abilities were also called into action on other works at Hampton-court, Greenwich hospital, and other places. He was made chief historical painter to the queen, and knighted by George I. and he acquired a very handsome fortune. He died 1732, aged 56, and left besides a son, a daughter married to Hogarth. Sir James was for some time member of the house of commons, and also fellow of the Royal society. He chiefly excelled in historical and in allegorical pieces, though his portraits and landscapes, also possessed great beauty.

THORNTON, Bonnel, an English poet, born in Maiden-lane, London, 1724. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1743, was elected to Christ-church. He wished to study medicine, and accordingly took his degree of M. B. in 1754, but he preferred a literary life to the labors of the medical profession. The first publication, in which he was engaged with Smart and others, was the Student, or Oxford and Cambridge Miscellany, in monthly numbers, which was collected 2 vols. 8vo. 1748. In 1754, the Connoisseur was undertaken jointly with Colman, and was continued for two years. In 1766, after the example of his friend Colman who had translated Terence, he published 2 vols. of a translation of Plautus, which though possessing merit, and admired by Warburton for its pure and elegant style, has not been very popular. In 1767, he published as an additional canto to Garth's Dispensary, the Battle of the Wigs, to ridicule the quarrels then kindled between the fellows and licenciates of the college of physicians. He died 9th May, 1768, aged 44, of the gout in his stomach, leaving behind him a widow with two sons and a daughter. His epitaph was written in Latin by his friend Dr. Warton, and placed on his grave in Westminster abbey. He wrote besides, the "Oxford Barber," and some periodical essays, &c. in the Public Advertiser, and other publications.

THOYNARD, Nicholas, a learned Frenchman, born at Orleans. He was well skilled in history, and in the knowledge of medals. He wrote a concordance of the four evangelists, in Greek and Latin, 1707, folio, with learned notes, and died at Paris, 5th Jan. 1706, aged 77.

THRASYBULUS, an Athenian general, celebrated for his bravery and his bold attack and expulsion of the 30 tyrants. He united the highest benevolence to personal courage, and passed an act of amnesty for the reconciliation of all parties. He was at last killed in a battle against the Apendians, B. C. 394.

THUANUS, Jacobus Augustus, or DE THOU, a celebrated French historian, born 9th Oct. 1553, at Paris, where his father was first president of the parliament. His infancy was passed in debility and disease, and while all possible care was bestowed to improve his constitution, little was done for the cultivation of his mind; his powers, however, shone forth early, and with unusual splendor. He was at first educated under private tutors, and then studied the law at Orleans, but as he was destined for the church, he was placed near his uncle, the bishop of Chartres, who resigned some of his preferments in his favor. In 1573 he visited Italy, and after devoting himself to the pleasures of retirement and study, he was employed in various negotiations in the Low Countries, and in 1578, made counsellor clerk to the parliament. The death of his brother, in 1579, induced him to give up the ecclesiastical profession, and he now gradually rose to offices of trust and honor. In 1581 he was sent to administer justice at Guyenne, with other counsellors, and in 1584, was made master of the requests. During the violence of the league he attached himself to Henry II. and was usefully employed in various negotiations by him. He afterwards enjoyed the favor of Henry IV. who appointed him his first librarian, and entrusted him with the negotiations with the duke of Guise, and with the protestants. Under Mary de Medicis he was one of the general directors of the finances. After a life spent honorably in the service of literature, and of his country, this great man died, 17th May, 1617, universally respected, not only as an historian, but as a man, and was buried in the chapel of St. Andrew of the Arches. He was twice married; by his first wife, who died 1601, he had no children, and by the second he had three sons. He is particularly distinguished for his History of his own Times, from 1545 to 1608, written in pure, elegant, and classical Latin, and admirable for its fidelity, correctness, and accuracy. It has been much and deservedly praised by Grotius, Casaubon, Perrault, and others; but as it speaks with freedom and truth, of men and of manners, it never appeared, but in a mutilated and partial form, till Dr. Mead undertook its publication, free from all omission, in 1733, in 7 vols. folio. Thuanus wrote besides, some poetical pieces, a Paraphrase on the Book of Job — on Ecclesiastes — the Lamentations of Jeremiah, &c. — Miscellanies, &c. The eldest of his sons, Francis Augustus, was librarian to the king; but he unfortunately did not reveal a conspiracy with which he was acquainted, made by the marquis d'Effiat, against Richelieu; and the cardinal, resenting the levity, and contemptuous manner in which he had been mentioned in the pages of the historian, most inhumanly sacrificed the son to his mean revenge, and caused him to be beheaded at Lyons, 1642.

THUCYDIDES, a celebrated Greek historian of Athens. He was in the military service of his country, and during a temporary disgrace, through the jealousy of his countrymen, he devoted himself to the composition of his famous History of Grecian Affairs in his own Times. He died 391 B. C. The best edition of his work is that of Duker. It has been ably translated by Dr. Smith.

THUILLIER, Dom Vincent, a native of Coucy, in Laon, distinguished among the members of the congregation of St. Maur. He was eminent as a preacher, and as a man of letters. He died 12th Jan. 1736, aged 51. He wrote Letters of an Ancient Professor of Theology on the Bull Unigenitus, &c. besides a translation of Polybius into French, in 6 vols. 4to.

THUNBERG, Charles Peter, an eminent Swedish botanist, the pupil and the friend of Linnæus. He visited France in 1770, and soon after, by the interference of his friend Burmann, he was sent by the Dutch company to Japan, to make observations and discoveries in botany. After a delay of three years at the Cape of Good Hope, where he made himself perfect in the Dutch language, he, in 1775, set out for Japan; but the jealousy of the inhabitants, and the mistrusting conduct of the government, limited his excursions, and he made few botanical discoveries. In 1776 he quitted Japan for Ceylon, and after some valuable observations in this island, he returned to Europe, and was appointed professor of botany at Upsal. He died at the end of the last century, leaving his valuable cabinet of natural history to the university. His Flora Japonica appeared at Leipzig 1784, 8vo. with 39 plates, and gave an account of above 300 unknown plants.

THURLOE, John, secretary to the Cromwells, during their usurpation, was born 1616, at Abbots-Roding, Essex, where his father was rector. He was educated for the law, and by the influence of judge St. John, he obtained some offices, and in 1645, was secretary to the parliamentary commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge. Though connected with the great republican leaders, he was not accessory to the king's death; but he favored with all his might, the affairs of the commonwealth, and in 1653, became secretary of state to Cromwell. In 1656 he was member for Ely, and the next year deserved the thanks of the commons for discovering Harrison's plot. On Cromwell's death he continued in his office under Richard, the next protector, over whom he had great influence, and at the restoration he made a tender of his services to the new monarch, who, however, did not accept them. He was accused, soon after, of high treason by the Commons, but released, and then he retired to his seat at Great Milton, Oxfordshire. His knowledge of political affairs was such, that Charles solicited him in vain to take a share in the administration, which he declined. He died suddenly at his chambers, Lincoln's Inn, 21st Feb. 1668, aged 51. He was twice married, and left, by his second wife, four sons and two daughters. In his character he was very amiable, and remarkable for his courtesy and mildness to persons of all parties. His State Papers, in 7 vols. folio, have been published, and they are valuable not only for conciseness and perspicuity, but for the general and important matter which they contain.

THURLOW, Edward lord, a celebrated lawyer. He was born in 1735, at Ashfield, Norfolk, where his father was rector, and after passing some time at Cambridge, he came to London, to study the law. He was called to the bar 1758, and raised himself to professional notice by his manly and successful opposition to sir Fletcher Norton. In the famous Douglas cause, in which he was accidentally engaged, he displayed such abilities, such eloquence, and such a command of arguments, that the public attention was turned towards him, as towards a man who was formed to fill the highest stations in the law. In 1770 he was appointed solicitor-general, and the next year succeeded sir William de Grey as attorney-general; but in the house of Commons he neglected the cultivation of his oratorical powers, till, in the beginning of the American war, he stepped forth with the most commanding language of eloquence in support of the measures of administration. In June 1778, he was created a peer and the day following he was nominated lord high chancellor of Great Britain. This dignified office he resigned in 1783, during the temporary triumph of the coalition ministry, but on the re-admission of Mr. Pitt into the cabinet, he again was promoted to the seals, and kept them till 1793, when a dispute with the premier occasioned his resignation. Since that time he lived in retirement, and seldom engaged in the political disputes of the day. He died after an illness of two days at Bournemouth 12th Sep. 1806, and was buried in the Temple church. His character as a lawyer is fixed on the firmest basis of extensive knowledge, quick penetration, correct judgment, and the most undeviating integrity. Though overbearing in his manners, harsh and uncivil, he was zealously attached to his party, and inflexible in his opinions, and loyal in his conduct. As a patron of church preferment, he was the friend of persevering industry, and active merit, and though lax in his private conduct, and in his moral principles, he was ever anxious to reward virtue and to encourage learning. In his court he displayed all the wisdom, and nothing of the low cunning of the lawyer, and with a powerful mind which quickly comprehended and discussed with clearness the most intricate cases, he pronounced his judgment by the strictest rules of equity and justice, alike anxious to protect the rights and the privileges of the poor, as the immunities of the great. He was, as has been well observed, among lawyers and orators, in the senate and in the courts, what his contemporary Johnson was among wits and authors, a mighty genius proudly elevated above the littleness of common minds. As he was not married his titles descended to the issue of his brother the bishop of Durham. He left three natural daughters, to two of whom he left 70,000l. each, and to the third, because she married against his consent, he, with the most uncharitable caprice, and studied cruelty, bequeathed only an annuity of 50l. per month, and on the condition that she never returned to her husband.

THYSIUS, Anthony, a Dutch philologist, born 1603. at Harderwyck. He became professor of poetry and eloquence at Leyden, and librarian to the university, and died there 1670. He published "Historia Navalis," a History of Naval Wars between the Dutch and Spaniards — Compendium Historiæ Bataviæ, 1645 — Tracts on the Government and the Laws of Athens, besides valuable editions of Paterculus, Salust, Valerius Maximus, Seneca's tragedies, Laetantius, Aulus Gellius, &c.

TIARINI, Alexander, a native of Bologna, eminently distinguished as a painter of portraits and historical pieces. He succeeded in happily expressing the passions. The best of his pieces are preserved in the church of St. Michael in Bosco. He died 1668, aged 91.

TIBALDI, Pelegrino, a native of Bologna, who became eminent as a painter, sculptor and architect. He studied at Rome under Vasari, and was patronized by Philip II. of Spain, who raised him to the dignity of marquis. He died at Bologna, 1592, aged 70. His son Dominico, was also distinguished as an architect. He built the palace Magnani, at Bologna, and other public edifices in that city, which are still deservedly admired. He died 1583, aged 42.

TIBERIUS, Claudius Nero, emperor of Rome after Augustus, promised a happy reign on his succession, but soon disgraced himself by debauchery, cruelty, and the most flagitious excesses. He died A. D. 37, aged 78.

TIBERIUS, Constantine, emperor of the East, was appointed by his merits colleague on the throne by Justin the younger. He was a wise, valiant, and benevolent prince, and died 582.

TIBULLUS, Aulus Albius, a Roman poet, in the age of Augustus. His elegies are much admired for ease, elegance and simplicity, and they are generally published with Propertius and Catullus.

TICKELL, Thomas, an English poet, born at Bridekirk, Cumberland, 1686. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship 1710, which he vacated by marrying at Dublin, 1726. He was early introduced to the notice and the patronage of Addison, who employed him in Ireland, and when secretary of state made him his under secretary. In 1724 he was secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, and continued in that honorable office till his death, which happened 23d April, 1740, at Bath. As a writer Tickell obtained some celebrity, and he must rank high among the minor English poets. His "Prospect of Peace" written during the negotiations with the French government under queen Anne was a popular work, and passed quickly through six editions. He wrote "the Royal Progress" on the arrival of George I. and published a translation of the first book of the Iliad, in opposition to Pope's version. This work, which some have regarded as the labor of Addison, was not without merit; but while it was approved by the literati at Button's, Pope, no way dismayed, boasted that he had the town, that is, the mob in his favor. "The Letter to Avignon" is a party poem of great merit, and expresses contempt without vulgarity, and maintains its dignity without insulting arrogance. Tickell published the works of his friend Addison after his death, and wrote also a very beautiful funeral poem in honor of his memory.

TICKELL, Richard, an eminent writer who first appeared before the public 1778, in his "Project," and soon after in his "Wreath of Fashion," two poems of some merit and celebrity. The most admired of his performances was the "Anticipation," in which he imitated with great success and humor the principal speakers in the parliament, and thus in some degree disarmed the opposition of the force of their argument. He altered Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd for the stage, 1781, and wrote also the Carnival of Venice, a comic opera. He was killed Nov. 4, 1793, by falling from the window of his apartments in Hampton-court. He had been one of the commissioners of the stamp-office. He was twice married, and by his first wife, Miss Linley, had three children.

TIDEMAN, Philip, a painter, born at Hamburgh. He was the pupil of Laireffe, and excelled in mythological and allegorical representations. He died 1705, aged 48.

TIEDEMANN, Dietrich, a native of Bremervorde, in the duchy of Bremen educated at Gottingen. By the recommendation of his friend Heyne, he obtained in 1766, the professorship of Greek and Latin, at Cassel, which he quitted, in 1786, for the chair of philosophy at Marburg. He wrote essay on an Explanation of the Origin of Language — System of the Stoic philosophy — Investigation of Man — Spirit of Speculative Philosophy — the first Philosophers of Greece — Argumenta Platonis; works of great merit, and deep erudition. He died 1803, aged 55.

TIGNY, G. de, a French naturalist. He published the Natural History of Insects, 10 vols. 8vo. — a work of great merit. His collection of insects, was large, curious, and valuable. He died, 1803.

TIGRANES, king of Armenia, opposed the power of Rome, but was easily conquered by Lucullus. He preserved his dominions, by a large bribe, and maintained himself, against the rebellion of his son, and the insurrection of his subjects. Pompey afterwards conquered him, and sent him in chains to Rome.

TILINGIUS, Matthias, a native of Westphalia, who studied medicine, which he professed at Rinteln. He was also physician to the court of Hesse Cassel, and died 1615. He wrote de Rhabarbaro, 4to. — Lili Albi Descriptio, 8vo. — de Laudano Opiate, 8vo. — Opologia Nova, 4to. — Treatise on Malignant Fevers — Anatomie de la Rate, 12mo.

TILLEMANS, Peter, a landscape painter, born at Antwerp. He came to England in 1708, with Casteels, and was patronized by the great, of whose horses, seats, races, &c. he drew very pleasing views. He died of an asthma, at Norton, Suffolk, 5th Dec. 1734, aged about 50.

TILLEMONT, Sebastian de Nain de, a French writer, born at Paris 1637. He was educated in the school of Port-royal, and distinguished himself, as an accurate and elegant author. He was an ecclesiastic, but of such humility of deportment, that he refused to succeed to the bishopric of Beauvais, and preferred obscurity, retirement, and literature, to all dignities. His indefatigable application proved at last too much for his constitution. He died 1698, aged 61. His Histoire des Empereurs, & Histoire Ecclesiastique, are two works, valuable for accuracy, correctness, precision, and elegance.

TILLET, N. du, a native of Bourdeaux, who devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, and published various works of merit, for the destruction of insects in corn, and for the improvement of the produce of the earth. This active and ingenious author, who was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and director of the mint, at Troyes, died 20th Dec. 1791, aged 60.

TILLI, John Tzerclaes count de, a native of Brussels, of an illustrious family. He quitted the order of the jesuits, for the military profession, and after signaling his courage against the Turks, in Hungary, he commanded the troops of Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, at the battle of Prague, 1620. He contributed to the capture of Breda, and of Heidelberg, and defeated Mansfeld, one of the rebel chiefs, and afterwards routed the forces of the duke d'Halberstadt, at Stavelo, and took Minden. In 1626, he obtained a great victory over the army of Denmark, at the battle of Lutter, and three years after went to Lubeck to settle the articles of peace, with the Danish ministers. When placed at the head of the imperial armies, he took Brandenburg, Magdeburg, and Leipsic, but he was soon after defeated by Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and received a mortal wound in defending the passage of the Lech, at Ingoldstadt, 30th April, 1632.

TILLI, Michael Angelo, a native of Florence, educated at Pisa. He studied medicine, and became physician to the grand duke, and professor in the university of Pisa, inspector of the botanical garden, and fellow of the London royal society. He published Catalogus Horti Pisani, fol. Florence, 1723, with 50 plates, and died 1740, aged 85.

TILLOTSON, John, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Sowerby, Yorkshire, Oct. 1630, son of a clothier, descended from an ancient Cheshire family. Though his father was a strict Calvinist, Tillotson was educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow 1651. The perusal of Chillingworth's works, and the friendship, and conversation of Cudworth, Whichcot, Worthington, Smith, Wilkins, and other learned divines, soon removed those principles, which he might have imbibed from puritanical instructors, and fitted him for the more active scenes of life. In 1656, he was tutor to the son of Mr. Prideaux, of Devonshire, and was afterwards curate to his friend Dr. Wilkins, at St. Lawrence, Jewry. After the restoration, he was curate of Chelshunt, and in 1663, was promoted to the rectory of Keddington, Suffolk, which he immediately resigned for the preachingship of Lincoln's-inn-society. In 1664, he was chosen Tuesday lecturer, at St. Lawrence, Jewry, and as being a popular preacher, he exerted himself strenuously against popery and atheism. In 1666 he took his degree of D. D. and afterwards was promoted to a prebend in the church of Canterbury, and also of St. Paul's, and in 1672, made dean of Canterbury. He attended his friend lord Russell, when condemned to die in consequence of the Rye-house plot, and he strongly urged him to admit the doctrine of non-resistance, a measure for which he was greatly censured, and for which he censured himself. At the revolution he was confidentially consulted by the princess Anne of Denmark, and for his integrity and loyalty, he was held in high esteem by the new king, and by his queen. In 1689, he was made clerk of the closet to William, and upon the suspension of Sancroft, in consequence of his refusal to take the oaths, he was nominated by the king, to fill the vacant see of Canterbury. His elevation gave great displeasure to the non-jurors, who directed all their virulence and malice against him, but he exhibited in his conduct, the persevering and conscientious prelate, intent upon the reformation of all ecclesiastical abuses, and eager to introduce greater regularity, and a more strict residence among his clergy. The reproaches which were hurled against him, though they depressed his spirits, did not alter the mildness of his manners; and after his death were found some bundles of papers, and letters, full of invective and malicious insinuations against him, on which he wrote with his own hand, "these are libels, I pray God forgive them, I do". The cares attendant upon an elevated situation, were felt and recorded by him, with all the resignation of a christian philosopher; and in his common place book, he inserted some strong and striking remarks, to remind the reader, that what appears to a distant spectator real grandeur, and perfect happiness, is too often experienced by the unhappy possessor, a source of misery, vexation, and trouble. This great and good man, was attacked by a palsy, which proved fatal, and he died in the arms of his respected friend Mr. Nelson, 24th Oct. 1694. His death was sincerely lamented. Dr. Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, preached his funeral sermon, and Locke was also in the number of those who regarded his departure, as a great loss to the church, and to the nation. He left nothing to his widow but the copy of his posthumous sermons, which sold for 2,500 guineas, to which the king added an annuity of 400l. in 1695, and in 1698 an addition of 200l. more. His sermons have been frequently published in 10 vols. 8vo — and in 3 folio. These volumes, have been and continue to be, universally read, and they have been translated also into various languages. They are the composition of an able divine, who displays throughout sound reasoning, strong sense, and solid piety, in a clear, elegant, unaffected style. Though abused by some critics, for inharmonious periods, and undignified metaphors, he is deservedly commended for his noble simplicity, and great copiousness; and not only Dryden, attributed his own perfect knowledge of prose writing, to the frequent perusal of Tillotson's works, but Addison, who was a judge of writing, regarded them as the chief standard of our language, and actually projected an English dictionary, to be illustrated with particular phrases, to be selected from the sermons. Dr. Birch has prefixed a copious life of the learned prelate, to his edition of his sermons.

TIMÆUS, a philosopher of Locris, the pupil of Pythagoras, and author of a treatise on the Nature of the Soul. He supposed that there is an universal motion in the universe.

TIMAGENES, a native of Alexandria, known as an historian. He was the slave of Sylla's sons, and afterwards was in the service of Augustus, but burnt the history of that emperor's reign, when he was discarded from his protection.

TIMOLEON, an illustrious Corinthian, who went to the assistance of Syracuse, when oppressed by the tyranny of Dionysius. He became there a most benevolent and popular character, and died B. C. 337.

TIMON, a misanthrope, born at Athens. He declared himself the enemy of the human race, and in his conduct exhibited the savage character of a man-hater.

hater. He said he loved Alcibiades, because he would prove one day the ruin of Athens.

TIMOTEO, da Urbino, a painter of eminence, born at Urbino. He died 1524, aged 54. His landscapes, historical pieces, and portraits, possessed particular beauty, and all the striking effects of taste and genius.

TIMOTHEUS, a musician of Miletus, splendidly rewarded by the Ephesians for a poem in honor of Diana, the protecting goddess of their city. He died about 557 B. C.

TIMOTHY, the disciple of St. Paul, was a native of Lystra in Lycaonia, and the son of a pagan by a Jewish woman. He labored earnestly with Paul in the propagation of the Christian faith, and he was made by him first bishop of Ephesus, and received, for the guide of his conduct in the ministry, the two excellent epistles which are still preserved in the New Testament. It is supposed that he was stoned to death, 97, for opposing the celebration of an impious festival in honor of Diana.

TINDAL, Matthew, a deistical writer, born 1657, at Beer-ferres, Devonshire, where his father was minister. He entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, 1672, and afterwards removed to Exeter, and thence was elected fellow of All Souls. In 1685 he took the degree of L.L. D. and under James II. declared himself a papist, but afterwards renounced the Roman catholic tenets, and took the oaths to secure his fellowship. He died in London, Aug. 1733. He is particularly known for two publications, the first, published 1706, the Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other priests, &c. 8vo. — and the other, published 1730, in 8vo. Christianity as old as the Creation, or the Gospel, a republication of the Religion of Nature. In the former of these works, the intention of the author was, in subtle and insinuating language, to destroy the authority of the church; and in the latter, his design, in the most plausible and artful manner, is to set aside revealed religion, and to establish that there is no other revelation but that of the law of nature imprinted upon the heart of all mankind. These works were deservedly censured, and among the ablest opponents of his tenets, he had Dr. Hickes, who had been his tutor at Lincoln, Dr. Conybeare, afterwards bishop of Bristol, Leland, Foster, and others. He wrote some tracts besides, on civil and religious liberty, and he left at his death a second volume to his Christianity as old as the Creation, the publication of which was prevented by Gibbon, bishop of London.

TINDAL, Nicholas, nephew to Matthew, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1713. He was afterwards fellow of Trinity college, and obtained the livings of Alverstoke, Hants, and of Great Waltham, near Chelmsford, and afterwards succeeded to the rectory of Colbourne, in the Isle of Wight. He died at Greenwich, where he was chaplain to the hospital, at an advanced age, 27th June, 1774. He published two quarto numbers of an intended history of Essex, in 3 vols. which, however, he relinquished for the translation of Rapin's History of England, in which he was assisted by Mr. Morant. This last work succeeded so well that, in addition to his agreement, his booksellers, the Knaptons, handsomely gave him a present of 200 guineas. He published besides Cantemir's History of the Ottoman Empire, folio — and Polymetis abridged, a Guide to Classical Learning, a useful work.

TINDALL, William, an English divine, author of Juvenile Excursions in Literature and Criticism, 12mo. — History and Antiquities of the Abbey and Borough of Evesham, 4to. — Plain Truth in a Plain Dress — Evils and Advantages of Genius contrasted, a poem, &c. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree 1778, and he was admitted into the Antiquarian society, and appointed chaplain to the Tower, where, in a fit of melancholy, he shot himself, 1804, at the age of 50.

TINELLI, Tiberio, a native of Venice, admired for his abilities as an historical and portrait painter. He was honored with the patronage of Lewis XII. and made knight of St. Michael. He died 1638, aged 52.

TINTORETTO, James, a famous painter, so called, as son of Robusto, a dyer at Venice, where he was born 1512. He studied under Titian, who observed his rising talents, and therefore dismissed him, as afraid of a powerful rival. Tintoretto studied the works of his predecessors, especially of Michael Angelo, with judgment, and deserved the surname of Furious, from the boldness of his paintings, the rapidity of his genius, and the vivacity of his spirit. He died 1594, leaving behind him a son and daughter, who also inherited his genius and his powers in the use of the pencil. The daughter married a German, and died 1590, aged 30, and the son, eminent as an historical painter, died 1637, aged 75. The pieces of Tintoret are deservedly admired, and though he is censured for the incorrectness of his outlines, and some other irregularities, his coloring, and the expression of his figures are particularly striking.

TIPPOO-SAIB, succeeded his father Hyder-Ally as king of Mysore, and of the Mahrattas, and he ably maintained his independence against the Great Mogul. During the American war, he joined the French in hostilities against the English; but after the breaking out of the French revolution, he was alone exposed to the fortunes of the war. In 1790 he was defeated at Travancore; Bangalore was afterwards taken, and yielding to the superior force of the British arms, he consented, in 1792, to make peace with lord Cornwallis by delivering up his two sons as hostages, and paying, besides the loss of part of his dominions, above three millions sterling. His intrigues with the French government, and his secret machinations to destroy the English power in India, renewed the war in 1799. He was quickly attacked by the British forces in his very capital, and in the storming of Seringapatam, the Mysore monarch was killed whilst bravely defending himself on the ramparts. He was 52 years old. Though oppressive and capricious in his government, he patronized the arts, and his fondness for literature was displayed in the valuable collection of books found in his palace, consisting of various works in the Sanscrit language in the 10th century, translations of the Koran, MSS. of the history of the Mogul victories, and and historical memoirs of Hindostan, all of which have been carefully deposited in the library of the university of Calcutta.

TIRABOSCHI, Jerome, a native of Bergamo, who entered among the jesuits, and became professor of rhetoric at Milan. He was in 1770 made librarian to the duke of Modena, and was enrolled in the number of the nobility by the unanimous voice of the people, who thus honored his virtues and his merits. He died June 1794, aged 62. He wrote Memoirs on the Ancient Order of the Humiliés, 3 vols. 4to. — Catalogue of the Writers of Modena, 6 vols. 4to. — History of Italian Literature from the days of Augustus, 13 vols. 4to. a work of great merit. His eulogy was written by Lombardi in Italian, and translated into French by Boulard.

TIRAQUEAU, Andrew, a French lawyer, counsellor of the parliament of Bourdeaux, and afterwards of Paris, was born at Poitou. His abilities were usefully employed by Francis I. and Henry II. and in their service he displayed great integrity and sound judgment, and exerted also all his influence to banish intrigue and chicane from the French bar. He died at an advanced age, 1574. He wrote various books and commentaries, and it was observed that he produced every year a child and a book, till the number of each was 20, some say 30; as it is recorded in a jocular epitaph, which mentions his being a water-drinker; "Hic jacet, qui aquam bibendo, viginti liberos fuscit, viginti libros edidit. Si merum bibisset, totum orbem implevisset."

TISSOT, S. A. D. a celebrated Swiss physician, a warm advocate of inoculation, and of experimental, rather than theoretical, systems of medicine. He was, in consequence of his great reputation, member of the medical societies of London, Berne, Basil, &c. He died at Lausanne, 15th June 1797, aged 70. His works, which are valuable, have been collected in 10 vols. 12mo. His Advice to Men of Letters, and to the people on the subject of health, and other smaller pieces, possess high merit, and are deservedly popular. He also edited Morgagni's works, 3 vols. 4to. 1779.

TITIAN, or TITIANO, a celebrated painter, descended from the ancient family of Vacelli, and born at Cadore in Friuli, 1477. His fondness for painting was early observed, and he was placed under the care of Bellino; but he improved himself more by the laudable emulation between him and his fellow pupil Giorgione, than by the instruction of his master. His abilities, and the execution of his pencil soon recommended him to the notice of the great; he was patronized by Charles V. who knighted him, made him a count palatine, assigned him a pension, and bestowed on him several handsome presents, which he gave him as a mark of his esteem, and not for his pictures, which he declared to be above any price. He died at Venice, of the plague, 1576, aged 99. His character as a man as well as a painter, was so universally respected, that he received the strongest marks of esteem and friendship from the greatest and most eminent persons in Europe. His pieces are much admired for their coloring, delicacy, and correctness.

His best pieces are a Last Supper in the Escorial — a Christ crowned with thorns, at Milan — and a portrait of himself, with his mistress combing her hair, in the Paris collection. He left two sons, one of whom, Horatio, was also eminent as a painter, till allured by the hopes of discovering the philosopher's stone, he applied himself to chemistry, and died of the plague with his father. Titian's brother, Francesco, was also a painter, and besides employed himself in making cabinets of ebony, adorned with figures, &c.

TITLEY, Walter, a polite scholar, educated at Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he held a lay fellowship. He was employed by the court as envoy extraordinary to Copenhagen, where he died, highly respected, 1754. He had been for some time resident in bishop Atterbury's house, as tutor to his son. He wrote an Imitation of Horace, and other Latin pieces, preserved in the Reliquiæ Galeana.

TITON DU TILLET, Everard, a native of Paris, educated at the jesuits' college, after which he followed the military profession. At the peace of Ryf-wick, he purchased a place in the royal household, and afterwards travelled into Italy as a man of letters, and an antiquarian. He formed in 1708 the plan of erecting a brazen Parnassus in honor of Lewis XIV. and the work was completed in 1718. In this singular monument the monarch was represented in the figure of Apollo holding a lyre, while below the graces are personified by de la Suze, des Houlières, and de Scuderi, three learned French ladies, and the nine muses appear under the name of P. Corneille, Molière, Racan, Segrais, la Fontaine, Chapelle, Racine, Despreaux, and the musician Lully. Medallions in this celebrated group are given to less known poets, and every person distinguished for literature or the fine arts, had due honors paid to his talents. Titon published in 1727 a description of this poetical monument, and of the characters of the personages represented; and as he continued additions to his Parnassus, he likewise added supplements to the lives and accounts of his heroes up to the year 1760. He died 26th Dec. 1762, aged 86.

TITUS, a Greek disciple of St. Paul, converted from the errors of paganism by that great apostle. He was the attendant and the amanuensis of his master, and was appointed by him bishop of Crete, where he died in a good old age.

TITUS VESPASIAN, a Roman emperor, distinguished at the siege of Jerusalem, under his father Vespasian, and deservedly celebrated for reforming the profligacy of his youth by the most correct morals when raised to the throne. He was so anxious to do good to his subjects, that he exclaimed one day, on discovering that he had granted no favor, "my friends I have lost a day." He died A. D. 81.

TIXIER, John, called also RAVISIUS TEXTOR, lord of Ravify in Nivernois, was an elegant scholar, and taught polite literature in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he died 1522. He wrote, among other things, epistles — dialogues — epigrams — an edition of Opera Scriptorum de Claris Mulieribus, folio, &c.

TOALDO,

TOALDO, Joseph, an Italian physician, who taught mathematics in the university of Padua, and bestowed much attention on subjects of electricity, astronomy, and meteorology. He published a Journal Astro-Meteorological — Memoirs on the Application of Meteorology to Agriculture — Cycle of 123 Moons, &c. He died at Padua, 11th Nov. 1797, aged 79.

TODD, Hugh, D. D. a divine, born at Blencow, Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was elected fellow of University, 1678. He was chaplain to Smith, bishop of Carlisle, and vicar of Stanwix, and accumulated his degrees 1692. He published various things, and died about 1710. The best known of his works are the Description of Sweden, folio — the Life of Phocion, &c. He left in MS. an History of the Diocese of Carlisle, &c. — Notitia Prioratus de Wedderhall — Notitia Ecclesiæ Cathedralis Carlilenfis, &c.

TOIRAS, John Caylard de St. Bonnet, marquis de, a native of St. Jean-de-Cardonnenques, who embraced the military profession, and served under Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. He distinguished himself at the sieges of Montauban and Montpellier, and at the taking of Rhé, and when governor of the Montferrat, he acquired new glory by his gallant defence of Casal, against marquis Spinola. He was, in consequence of his services, made marshal of France; but the attachment of his brothers to the party of Orleans, and the mean jealousies of Richelieu brought on his disgrace, and he retired from France, and found in Italy, at Naples, Rome, Venice, and other places, that respect for his talents and meritorious services, which his ungrateful country refused to acknowledge. He afterwards became a general in the army of the duke of Savoy, and was killed before the fortrefs of Fontanette, in the Milanese, 14th June, 1636, aged 51. His reputation for courage was such, that after he expired, the soldiers dipped their handkerchiefs in the blood which issued from his wound, exclaiming, that so long as they carried that with them, so long would they prove victorious over their enemies.

TOLAND, John, one of the founders of modern deism, was born 30th Nov. 1669, in the north of Ireland, and educated at Redcastle school, near Londonderry, from which he went to Glasgow, 1687, and three years after to Edinburgh. Though brought up as a papist, he renounced that religion, and at the age of 15, declared himself a zealous protestant dissentor. He afterwards went to study at Leyden, and then returned to England, and visited Oxford, and in 1696, published at London his Christianity not Myste-rious, which excited great clamor against the writer, and even occasioned its presentation as dangerous by the grand jury of Middlesex. At this time he went to Ireland, but here the fame of his book was spread, and not only his company was shunned, as infectious, but his work was attacked by the parliament, and ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. He, upon this, returned to England, and was engaged in various publications. His Life of Milton was published in 1698, and some other works on political or religious subjects followed. He was abroad in 1703, at the court of Berlin and Hanover, where he was received with great respect, and on his return to England, he was for some time patronized by Harley, earl of Oxford. In 1718, he published his Nazarenus, or Jewish, Gentile, or Mahometan Christianity, &c. which was a violent attack against revelation, and in 1720 appeared his Tetradymus, in four parts. He died at Putney, near London, where he had retired for some time, 11th March, 1722. It must be fully acknowledged that Toland possessed vast erudition, and great powers of mind; but, unfortunately, these were misapplied in the support of atheism. The wish of being known in the world, and the strong passion of vanity, with which he was influenced, led him to adopt opinions which, probably, sober reflection disapproved; and the ambition of being singular, hurried him to oppose whatever is held as most sacred and solemn amongst mankind. His works were very numerous; those which were posthumous were published in 2 vols. 8vo. 1726, and re-published 1747, with an Account of his Life and Writings by Des Maizeaux.

TOLLET, Elizabeth, an English lady, eminent for her knowledge of mathematics, of history, of French, Latin, and Italian. She published some poems, besides Susannah, or Innocence Preserved, a sacred drama, and died unmarried 1754, aged 60.

TOLLIVS, Jacobus, a physician, born at Ingra, in the territory of Utrecht. He was, in 1684, made professor of eloquence and Greek at Brandenburg, by the elector, and died 1696. He possessed great learning, but favored the notion of discovering the philosopher's stone. He edited Ausonius, in 8vo., and Longinus, in 4to., and wrote Epistolæ Itinerariæ. His brother Cornelius was at first an amanuensis to Isaac Vossius, and then became professor of eloquence and Greek at Harderwyck, and published an appendix to Pierius Valerianus' treatise de Infelicitate Litteratorum, 12mo. Another brother, Alexander, published an useful and valuable edition of Appian.

TOLOMMEI, Claudio, a native of Sienna, who distinguished himself as a poet and orator, and was, in consequence of his abilities, made bishop of Corsica. The best known of his works is a speech, which he delivered in the presence of pope Clement VII. in consequence of the peace made with Charles V. in 1529. This truly learned and virtuous man died 1557, aged 63.

TOMPION, Thomas, a celebrated mechanic. His name is mentioned with those of Graham, and other ingenious men, as an able clock and watch maker. He died 1696.

TONSTALL, Cuthbert, a native of Tackford, Hertfordshire, who studied at the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Padua, and distinguished himself for his knowledge of mathematics and divinity. He was employed in several embassies by Henry VIII. and for his services was made bishop of London 1522, lord privy seal 1523, and in 1530, translated to Durham. He was deprived of his honors by Elizabeth, for denying her supremacy, though he had formerly supported her father in the work of the reformation, and he died in confinement, 1559, aged 84. He was author of a treatise de Arte Supputandi, Lond. 1522, 4to. — on the Presence of Christ in the Eucharist, 4to. — Aristotle's Morals abridged, &c.

TOOKE, Andrew, an English writer, born in London, don, 1673. He was educated at the Charter-house, and Clare-hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1695 he was made usher of the Charter-house, and in 1704 professor of geometry at Gresham college, and though he inherited much property from his brother, the bookseller in Fleet-street, he was so attached to his habits of life that he accepted the headship of the school, 1728. He died of a dropsy, 20th Jan. 1731, aged 58, and was buried in the Charter-house chapel. He published Synopsis Græcæ Linguae — Ovid's Fasti — the Pantheon, or History of the Heathen Gods translated, without acknowledgment from the Latin of Pomey, a jesuit.

TOOKE, George, of Popes in Hertfordshire, was born 1595. He went as captain of a band of volunteers in the expedition against Cadiz in 1625, of which he wrote a poetical account. He retired to his seat, and devoted himself, during the civil wars, to literary pursuits, and the conversation of his friends, the learned Selden, Hales, John Greaves, &c. He lost his wife 1642, and wrote various canzonets to her memory. He died 1675, aged 80.

TOOKE, Thomas, a learned schoolmaster, born in Kent, and educated at St. Paul's school, and Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was appointed master of the school at Bishop Stortford, and by his influence and recommendation a new school was erected by contributions, and the seminary was raised, under his auspices, to great celebrity. He died 4th May, 1721, after 30 years usefully employed in the labors of his school, and was buried at Lamborn in Essex, where he had been 14 years rector.

TOPHAM, Thomas, a publican of Islington, of whose prodigious strength curious particulars are related in Hutton's History of Derbyshire. It is said that he could squeeze together a pewter quart pot at arms' length; lift over his head with his little finger a weight of 200lbs. and with his teeth raise an oak table six feet long, at the extremity of which was suspended half a hundred weight. He raised with apparent ease, and with one hand, a man who weighed 27 stone, and so powerful was the strength of his arms, that he broke against it the largest sticks. He stabbed himself in 1749 in consequence of a quarrel with his wife, and after wounding her in a dangerous manner.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, a native of Farnham in Surrey, educated at Westminster school, and Dublin university. He became in 1768 vicar of Broadhembury, Devon; but finding the air of the place unfavorable to his constitution, he settled in London, and officiated in a chapel, Orange-street, Leicester-fields. He was author of Historic Proofs of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England, and other theological works, which have been collected together in 6 vols. 8vo. with an account of his life. He died in London, 1778, aged 41.

TORFÆUS, Thormodus, a native of Mifnia, historiographer to the king of Denmark. He is known for his History of the Orcaades from 850 to 1206, published 1715, folio — and his History of Norway, 4 vols. folio, 1711, two works written in Latin, and possessing great merit. He died 1720, aged 81.

TORRE', N. a native of the Milanese, who from low beginnings, rose to eminence, as a chemist, and as an artist in fire-works. By his great application, he became acquainted with experimental philosophy, and the friendship of Reaumur, rendered him expert in the construction of barometers, and in the knowledge of pneumatics. His artificial fire-works, exhibited at Paris, on the marriage of Lewis XVI. were much admired, and in his experiments in pyrotechny, it is said, that he discovered the method of preparing, an unextinguishable fire, which might consume an enemy's fleet. This dreadful secret was revealed to the French government, who refused to practise it against the English fleet, and the inventor at last, sensible of the terrible consequences of this powerful engine of destruction, expressed great contrition for his discovery. The sudden death of his wife had such an effect upon him, that he soon followed her to the grave, 30th April, 1780. Though an intelligent man, he wasted much of his time, in the foolish attempt of transmuting metals into gold.

TORRENTIUS, Lævinus, a learned man, born at Ghent in Flanders, 1525, and educated at Louvain. He studied the civil law at Bologna, and on his return home was employed in some embassies. He afterwards took orders, and died bishop of Antwerp, 1595. He published Latin poems — Commentaries on Suetonius and Horace, &c.

TORRENTIUS, John, a painter of Amsterdam. He possessed merit, but unfortunately was so lascivious in his ideas, that all the powers of his art were employed in delineating naked and obscene figures, in the most licentious and disgusting attitudes. Not satisfied to corrupt the youthful and unwary by the extravagant efforts of his pencil, he became the founder of a sect of Adamites, and for his heretical opinions was seized by the magistrates, and tortured. He expired under the severity of his torments, 1640, and his offensive pieces were burnt by the hands of the hangman.

TORRICELLI, Evangeliste, an eminent mathematician, born at Faenza, 1608. He was well educated, and he learned philosophy under Castelli, who had been the pupil of the great Galileo. His progress in science was so great that he was recommended to Galileo, and went to live with him as an assistant and friend; but the death of that venerable philosopher three months after left him to his own pursuits. He settled at Florence, where he was patronized by the duke Ferdinand II. and he devoted himself to the construction and improvement of telescopes and microscopes. To his ingenious experiments we are indebted for the discovery of ascertaining the weight of the atmosphere by quicksilver in the barometer or Torricellian tube. He died after a few day's illness, 1647, aged 40. He published Opera Geometrica, 4to. 1644.

TORY, Geoffry, a native of Bourges, who settled at Paris, as professor of philosophy in the college of Burgundy, and afterwards became printer. He greatly improved the art of printing, and published an useful book on the Proportion and Distance of Letters, called Champ Fleuri, 4to. and 8vo. He also translated the Hieroglyphics of Horus Apollo, 8vo. and wrote Ædiloquium, &c. He died 1550.

TOSCANELLA, Paul, an able astronomer, who erected erected in Florence cathedral a famous gnomon, of which a description has been published by father Ximenes in 4to. 1757. It is said to be the largest of the kind in Europe. Some suppose that Toscanella formed an idea of the possibility of a passage to the East by the Cape of Good Hope, and by mentioning the circumstance to Martenz of Lisbon, the Portuguese, it is said, were animated in their endeavours to improve navigation and to make discoveries. He died about 1490.

TOSTATUS, Alphonso, a doctor of Salamanca, bishop of Avila, who distinguished himself by his eloquence at the council of Basil, and died 1454, aged 40. He wrote Commentaries on Eusebius' Chronicle, 5 vols. folio — Commentaries on Scripture, &c. His works were printed together at Venice, 1596, in 13 vols. folio, 2 ponderous vols.

TOTILA, king of the Goths, defeated the troops of the emperor Justinian, and obtained possession of Italy, Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily. He sacked Rome, and was at last killed in battle by one of the foldiers of Justinian, 552, in the 11th year of his reign.

TOTTIE, John, a learned divine, who became canon of Christ-church, and archdeacon of Worcester. He was an able and eloquent preacher, and was much admired at St. Mary's, Oxford. His sermons have been published, and are deservedly esteemed. He died after 1775.

TOUP, Jonathan, a learned critic, born at St. Ives, in Cornwall, 1713. He was educated in the school of his native town, and at St. Merryn's, and then entered at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree. His master's degree was taken at Cambridge 1756. His "Emendationes in Suidam," which first appeared in 1760, and were continued in another volume, 1764, recommended him to the notice of Warburton, by whose means bishop Keppel bestowed on him a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and the vicarage of St. Merryn's. He published his Appendiculus Notarum in Suidam, 1775, and in 1778 his edition of Longinus in 4to. and afterwards in 8vo. He passed his life in retirement, devoted to literary pursuits; but though unacquainted with the world, he was the correspondent of the learned of the age, of Ernestus, Brunck, Valknaer, Runkenius, Larcher, &c. He died 1785, aged 72, and was buried in St. Martin's church, Exeter, of which he was rector. He was never married.

TOURNEFORT, Joseph Pitton de, a celebrated French botanist, born at Aix in Provence, 5th June, 1656. From his very youth he showed a strong passion for collecting plants, and though devoted to theological pursuits by his father, he did not abandon his favorite studies, and when become his own master, he applied himself most assiduously to botany, philosophy, and medicine. In 1678 he explored the mountains of Dauphiné and Savoy in quest of plants, and in 1679 perfected himself in anatomy and medicine at Montpellier. In 1681 he set out for Spain, and after visiting attentively the mountains of Catalonia and the Pyrenees, frequently in the midst of danger from the uncivilized inhabitants, he returned to France with the intention of exploring also the Alps, to enrich his botanical curiosities. In 1683 he was at Paris, where his merit began to be known, and he was appointed botanical professor in the king's garden. He afterwards travelled over Spain, Portugal, Holland, and England, and in 1700 was sent by the king to examine the plants of Greece, Asia, and Africa, and to make observations on the manners and the natural history of those countries. He returned after an absence of three years, and brought with him 1356 species of plants. He was soon after made professor of physic in the college royal, and admitted into the academy of sciences. He received an injury from the wheel of a cart which passed by him, and neglecting the proper remedies, he was seized with a spitting of blood, which after some months carried him off, 28th Dec. 1708. This most celebrated botanist of the age published, Elements of Botany, 3 vols. 8vo. enlarged to 3 vols. 4to. — History of Plants near Paris, 12mo. enlarged to 2 vols. — Voyage to the Levant, 2 vols. 4to. and three in 8vo. — a treatise on the Materia Medica, 2 vols. 12mo. besides several papers in the history of the academy of sciences.

TOURNELY, Honoré, a French ecclesiastic, born at Antibes 28th Aug. 1658, of obscure parents. He gradually rose by his great application from the mean office of a swineherd, to become professor of theology at Douay, and a popular preacher. He was much engaged in the controversy about the bull Unigenitus, which he defended with great ability. He died of an apoplexy, 26th Dec. 1729. The best known of his works is a Course of Theology in Latin, 16 vols. 8vo. a composition of great merit.

TOURRETTE, Mark Anth. Lew. Claret de la, a native of Lyons, who studied in the jesuits' college at Lyons, and afterwards at the Harcourt college at Paris. He became one of the magistrates of his native city, and devoted himself much to the study of natural history. He formed a valuable collection of insects and of herbs, and cultivated in his garden not less than 3000 of the rarest and most curious plants. This amiable man, whose zeal in the investigation of natural curiosities and in botanical pursuits was indefatigable, and whose correspondence was extended to all the learned of Europe, was attacked by an inflammation in the lungs at the siege of his native town in the autumn of 1793, and he survived it but few days. He died aged 64. He published, Démonstrations Elementaires de Botanique, 2 vols. 8vo. — Voyage au Mont Pila, 8vo. — Chloris Lugdunensis, 8vo. — Memoires sur les Montres Vegetaux, &c.

TOURVILLE, Anne Hilarion de Costentin de, a French admiral, born at Tourville, near Contances 1642. He first distinguished himself against the Algerines, and afterwards at the battle of Palermo, and against the Spanish fleet. He defeated in 1690, the combined fleets of England, and Holland, but the battle of la Hogue, two years after, proved fatal to his glory, and to the honor of the French flag, by the loss of 14 of his largest ships. He was honored in 1701, with the staff of marshal of France, and died the same year, 28th May, aged 59.

TOUSSAINT LOUVÉRTURE, a mulatto of St. Domingo, who by his courage and abilities rose to command in the French army under Rochambeau, in 1796. The influence which he possessed among the blacks, induced him to aspire to sovereign power, and the cruelties which the French began to exercise against the natives, served to increase the numbers which flocked to his rebellious standard. After establishing a constitution in the island, and being acknowledged the head of all power civil and military, he consolidated his authority, by the wisest, and most humane regulations; but his confidence in the friendly professions of the French, who still kept an army in the province, proved fatal to him. He trusted his person amongst them, and instead of being respected as an independent chief, he was seized as a criminal, and sent to France by le Clerc. Immured in a prison, his sufferings were disregarded, while his countrymen, indignant at his treatment, rose to repel their ferocious invaders. This ill-treated, but truly valiant chieftain, died in his prison 1803, and it is said that either poison, or violence, hastened his death.

TOWERS, Joseph, a dissenting minister, born at Southwark 1737. He followed the printing business with Goadby, of Sherborne, and then settled as a bookseller in London, and in 1774 became pastor of a presbyterian congregation at Highgate. Four years after he was associated with Dr. Price, in Newington-green meeting, and in 1779 was honored, by Edinburgh university, with the degree of L. L. D. He wrote, British Biography, 7 vols. 8vo. — Observations on Hume's History of England — the Life and Reign of Frederic III. of Prussia, 2 vols. 8vo. — a Vindication of Locke — Sermons — an Answer to Burke's famous pamphlet, and other political tracts. He also assisted Dr. Kippis, in the new edition of the Biographia Britannica. He died 1799.

TOWNLEY, Charles, an eminent English collector of antiquities, born at Townley-hall, Lancashire, long the residence of his ancient family. With genuine taste in the knowledge of antiquities, and with the command of an independent fortune, he zealously devoted his labors to the formation of a noble collection, and his house, in Park-street, became the depository of the bulky fragments of Egyptian architecture, and the more pleasing and beautiful specimens of the Grecian and Roman models. His medals were also numerous and valuable, and among his choice MSS. was a Homer, which he permitted to be collated, in a late edition of that poet. The Etruscan vases, and other antiquities of his collection, were illustrated in 2 vols. 4to. by d'Ancarville, a French antiquarian who has explained the mythological representations and inscriptions, with ingenious observations. Mr. Townley, who was fellow of the antiquarian and royal societies, and one of the trustees of the British museum, died at his house Park-street, 3d Jan. 1805, aged 67. By his will he left 4000l. for the building of a museum, at Standish, for the reception of his valuable antiquities, but as the bequest has not been complied with, the whole collection is, agreeable to his further directions, now deposited in the British museum, for which purpose parliament have granted a very liberal allowance to the trustees.

TOWNSON, Thomas, D. D. an able divine, born in Essex 1715. From Christ-church, Oxford, he removed to Magdalen college, where he obtained a fellowship, and afterwards was presented successively to Hatfield Peverel, in Essex, Blithfield, Staffordshire, the lower moiety of Malpas, Cheshire, and by the patronage of bishop Porteus, Richmond archdeaconry, Yorkshire. He is eminently known for his valuable discourses on the four gospels, and three tracts in answer to the Confessional, and since his death, which happened in 1792, a discourse on the Evangelical History has appeared with his life.

TOZZETTI, John Targioni, an eminent botanist, born at Florence, 11th Sep. 1722. He was educated at Pisa, and succeeded in 1737 his master Micheli in the care of the botanic garden of Florence. In 1737, he was made professor of botany there, and consulting physician to the government. He was engaged with Cocchi in making a catalogue of the famous library at Florence, and in consequence of his fame as a physician and botanist, he was admitted into several of the learned societies of Europe. He was one of the first who introduced inoculation in Tuscany. He died at Florence 1780, of an atrophy. His publications in Latin, as well as in Italian, are very respectable. He published a thesis "De Præstantiâ & Ufu Plantarum in Medicinâ," fol. — a work on the Improvement of Medicine in Etruria, in 4 vols. 4to. &c.

TRADESCANT, John, a Dutchman, who travelled over the best part of Europe, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, and Barbary, and at last settled in England, where he became superintendant of the gardens of Charles I. It is said that he was the first who formed in England a collection of medals and objects of natural history. His son was also a great traveller. They had a large garden at Lambeth, well stocked with various plants and trees from foreign countries. An account of their valuable collection appeared under the name of Museum Tradescantium. The father died 1652, and the monument of the family is still seen in Lambeth church-yard.

TRAJAN, M. Alpinus Crinitus, a Roman emperor. After serving under Vespasian and Titus in their Asiatic campaigns, and after supporting by his valor the power of Nerva, he was associated with him on the throne. He was a brave and popular prince, though he persecuted the Christians. He died in Cilicia, 117 A. D.

TRALLIAN, Alexander, a native of Tralles in Lydia, eminent as a medical writer. He first used cantharides for the cure of the gout, and practised phlebotomy with success, about 550 A. D. His works, all on medical subjects, have appeared at Basil, Paris, and London.

TRAPP, Joseph, an able divine, born 1672 at Cherrington, Gloucestershire, where his father was rector. He was educated by his father and then entered at Wadham college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was the first poetry-professor on the Birkhead foundation, and he published the lectures which he delivered under the title of Prælectiones Poeticæ, a very elegant gant and ingenious work. As he had given excellent rules for the forming of a poet, he afterwards attempted to act up to those rules in the translation of the Æneid, but in this he totally failed. Virgil, as has been well observed, viewed through the medium of Trapp, appears an accurate writer, and the Æneid a well conducted fable; but discerned in Dryden's page, he glows as a fire from heaven, and the Æneid is a continued series of whatever is great, elegant, pathetic, and sublime. Dr. Trapp was rector of Harlington, Middlesex, of Christ-church, Newgate-street, and St. Leonard's, Foster-lane, and lecturer of St. Lawrence, Jewry, and of St. Martin's in the Fields. Though acquainted with the great he obtained no higher preferment. He died 22d Nov. 1747, and left behind him an excellent character, as a critic, a scholar, a preacher, and as a man. He published Milton's Paradise Lost, in Latin verse — 4 vols. of sermons — Abraham, a tragedy — a treatise on being over righteous — besides 2 vols. of his Prælectiones — a poem in the Musæ Anglicanæ, and, among other poems, one on the duke of Ormond, of which only 11 copies were sold.

TRAVERSARI, Ambrose, a monk born at Cameldoni near Florence, 1386. He translated into Latin Dionigenes Laertius which he inscribed to Cosmo de Medici, and the work possessed merit, and has often been reprinted. He was for some time interpreter between the Greeks, who fled from Constantinople, and the Italians who hospitably received them.

TRAVIS, George, a native of Royton, Lancashire, educated at Manchester school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards was promoted to Eastham vicarage, and Handley rectory, Cheshire, and obtained the archdeaconry of Chester, and a prebend in that church. He ably attacked Gibbon's history, and showed himself a strenuous assertor of the genuineness of the famous passage in 1 John v. 7. about the three witnesses, against Griesbach, Porson, Marsh, and Pappelbaum. He died at Hampstead 24th April, 1797.

TREMBLEY, Abraham, a native of Geneva who retired to Holland, not to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, according to the wishes of his father. After being private tutor to some persons of distinction in Holland, he came to London, and undertook the education of the duke of Richmond. He returned to Geneva 1757, where he married, and became an useful member of the republic. He died there 1784, aged 74. His works are Memoirs on Polypus, 4to. — Instructions from a Father to his Children, on Natural Religion, 2 vols. 8vo. — Instructions on Natural Religion, 3 vols. 8vo. — Enquiries on Virtue and Happiness, &c.

TREMELLIUS, Immanuel, a protestant divine, born at Ferrara, 1510, of Jewish parents. He was converted by Peter Martyr, and after visiting England and Holland, he settled at Heidelberg, where he was appointed Hebrew professor. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew at Sedan, where he died 1580. He published a translation of the Bible, much esteemed by Matt. Poole and others, and also a Latin version of the Syriac Testament.

TREMOILLE or TRIMOUILLE, Louis de la, viscount de Thouars, a French general of illustrious birth, born 20th Sep. 1460. He so early displayed his valor that at the age of 18 he was made general of the French forces, and at the battle of St. Aubin-du-Cormier in 1488 he took prisoner the duke of Orleans, afterwards Lewis XII. He possessed equal abilities as a negociator, and was successfully employed as an ambassador at the courts of Britany, of Vienna, and of Rome. Lewis XII. when raised to the throne forgot the injuries which he had received from this powerful subject, and entrusted him with his armies in Italy, and rewarded his services with several honorable appointments. Tremoille was wounded at the battle of Novara, but bravely defended Dijon against the Swiss, and protected Picardy and Provence against the attacks of invading armies. He fell gloriously at the fatal battle of Pavia, 24th Feb. 1525, aged 65. An account of his life was published by Bouchet, 4to. His grandson Francis was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, and recommended himself to the favor of his sovereign by his attentions to him during his captivity. He died at Thouars 1541, aged 39. There were others of this family distinguished for their fidelity and services to the crown.

TREMOLLIERE, Peter Charles, a native of Chollet, in Poitou, who died at Paris 1739, aged 36. He studied under J. B. Vanloo, and after a residence of six years in Italy he settled at Paris. His shipwreck of Ulysses, his golden age, and his altar pieces, are much admired.

TRENCHARD, John, an English patriot, born 1669. He was bred to the law, but never followed it as a profession. He was commissioner of forfeited estates in Ireland, and enjoyed independence and comfort, by the offices he held, and by marriage. He began publishing in 1697, and distinguished himself as a political writer. In 1720 he began with Thomas Gordon to publish in the London, and the British Journal, letters under the name of "Cato" which were popular, and attracted much attention. He was member of parliament for Taunton, Somersetshire, and died 1723 of an ulcer in his kidneys. He published some pamphlets now forgotten. He is described by his friend Gordon as a man of extraordinary talents, and great probity, and one of the worthiest, ablest, and most useful men this country ever produced.

TRENCK, Francis, baron de, a Prussian nobleman, who by his imprudent conduct drew upon him the displeasure of his government, and was imprisoned. After a long captivity he escaped, and published his memoirs, which contain a curious account of his adventures and sufferings, but not always in the language of truth. He came to France during the revolution, and wishing to acquire popularity among the leaders of the state, he was arrested as a suspected person, and by the revolutionary tribunal sentenced to the guillotine. He suffered in the summer of 1794, aged 70.

TREVISANI, Francis, a native of Trieste, eminent as a painter. He married a Venetian lady of illustrious birth, and afterwards settled at Rome, where he acquired celebrity and opulence. His historical pieces and his landscapes are deservedly admired. He died at Rome 1746, aged 90.

TREVISI, Jerome, a native of Trevisi. He came to England and recommended himself to the notice of Henry VIII. to whom he was appointed painter and chief engineer. He was killed at the siege of Boulogne, 1544. He chiefly excelled in history and in portraits.

TRISSINO, John George, an Italian poet, born at Vicenza, 1478. He studied at Milan and at Rome, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He married in 1503, and retired to the enjoyment of domestic happiness and learned ease. The death of his wife, by whom he had two sons, drew him into public life, and at Rome he soothed the sorrows of his domestic misfortunes by writing a tragedy, Sophonisba, which was received with universal applause, and acted before pope Leo X. with unusual pomp and magnificence. He was afterwards employed in some embassies by the pope, and universally respected for his talents as a negociator. His second marriage 1526, and his fondness for a son, the fruit of this marriage, proved the source of misery to him. His eldest son was jealous of his partiality for this younger child, and sued his father for the property of his departed mother, in which he prevailed. This had such effect upon Trissino, that he died of chagrin at Rome, 1550. His works were published 2 vols. fol. Verona, 1720. His chief poem is Italy Delivered from the Goths by Belisarius, in Italian, a work which displays genius and felicity of invention, though it does not possess the flights or beauties of Tasso. If he was not the greatest modern poet, he was the first who attempted an epic poem in blank verse, and in a language as yet unclassical.

TRIVULCE, John James, a native of Milan, banished from his country for his attachment to the Guelphs. He next entered into the service of the king of Arragon, and afterwards of Charles VIII. king of France, and for his meritorious actions was promoted to the rank of marshal of the kingdom. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Aignadel in 1509, but the defeat of the French before Novara was attributed to his negligence, and therefore his character suffered much in the public estimation, till his services to Francis I. in the crossing of the Alps 1515, restored him to popularity. He afterwards distinguished himself at the battle of Marignan, and died at Arpajon, 5th Dec. 1518, aged about 80. His relation, Theodore, was also marshal of France, and distinguished himself at the battle of Aignadel. He was made governor of Genoa by Francis I. and when obliged to surrender through famine, to a besieging army, he retired to Lyons, where he died 1531. His brother Anthony was a cardinal, and four others of that family also were raised to the rank of cardinals in the 16th and 17th centuries.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, author of a valuable history of the world to the age of Augustus, flourished about 41 B. C. The work was epitomized by Justin, and the original is lost.

TROMMIUS, Abraham, a protestant, born at Groningen 1633. He wrote a valuable Greek concordance of the Old Testament, 2 vols. fol. 1718, and died the next year.

TROMP, Martin Hapbertz, a native of Brille, who at the age of eight embarked for the Indies in the naval service of his country. He distinguished himself before Gibraltar, 1607, and by degrees rose from the lowest station to the chief command, and was made admiral of Holland. He defeated a numerous Spanish fleet in 1639, and signalized his valor in the service of his country in 32 other naval battles. He was killed on the quarter deck while commanding the fleet which engaged the English ships under Albemarle, 10th Aug. 1653, and he was honored by his countrymen with a most splendid funeral in Delft church, where his remains were deposited. This brave man refused all titles except that of father of the sailors.

TROMP, Cornelius, son of the above, distinguished himself also in the naval service of the republic, against the corsairs of Barbary in 1650, and against the English in 1653, and 1665. He behaved with great valor in the two naval battles fought with the English fleet in 1673, and three years after he succeeded Ruyter as admiral of the fleets of the United Provinces. He died 21st May, 1691, aged 62.

TRONCHIN, Theodore, a physician, born at Geneva 1704. He came to England with lord Bolingbroke his relation, and after studying at Cambridge he went to Leyden, where he devoted himself to medicine, under the care of the great Boerhaave. After taking his degrees he settled at Amsterdam as physician, but returned to Geneva in 1754, and two years after removed to Paris, where he inoculated some of the royal family with great success. He was much respected in this capital, and acquired great celebrity and equal independence. He died there 1781, deservedly lamented for his benevolence and humane attention to the diseases of the poor. He wrote de Nymphæ, 8vo. — de Colicâ Pictorum, 8vo. besides an edition of Bailon's works, and various communications to the Encyclopedie.

TROOST, Cornelius, a native of Amsterdam, distinguished as an historian and a painter. He died 1750, aged 53. His chief piece is preserved in the school of surgery at Amsterdam, where he represents an anatomical professor in the act of dissecting a body before his attentive pupils.

TROY, Francis de, a native of Toulouse, who studied painting under his father and under le Fevre. He became professor, and afterwards director of the academy of painting, and was patronized by the royal family. His female figures were particularly pleasing, so that it was said of him, that he had stolen the cestus of Venus. He died at Paris 1730, aged 85.

TROY, John Francis, son of the above, died at Rome 1752, aged 76. He also excelled as a painter, and was made rector of the academy of painting at Paris, afterwards director of that of Rome, and a knight of the order of St. Michael. His Niobe changed into a rock, his Esther and his Jason, are admired pieces.

TROYEN, Rombrud, a Flemish painter, who travelled in Italy, and excelled in the representation of grottoes, caves, ruins, and all objects of a dark and melancholy appearance. He died 1650.

TRUBLET, Nicholas Charles Joseph, a native of St. Malo, who became member of the French academy, of the Berlin academy, and treasurer of the church of Nantes. He published Reflexions on Telemachus, which introduced introduced him to la Mothe and Fontenelle, and he enjoyed the patronage of cardinal de Tencin, but preferred retirement and privacy to the honors which the court might have heaped upon him. His essays on literature and morality, 4 vols. 12mo. possess great merit, and have been translated into various languages. He wrote besides, memoirs of la Mothe and Fontenelle, &c. and died March 1770, aged 73.

TRUCHET, John, a native of Lyons. He applied himself to philosophy and divinity, but mechanics proved his favorite pursuit. Under the patronage of the great Colbert, he paid attention to geometry and hydraulics, and his superior knowledge was consulted in the construction of canals and aqueducts. He also improved the mode of bleaching, and invented various machines for purposes of commerce, and for the promotion of the arts. This ingenious man, who had embraced the order of the Carmes, died at Paris 5th Feb. 1729, aged 72. As he was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, he enriched their memoirs with valuable communications.

TRUMBULL, William, LL. D. an eminent statesman, born in Berkshire. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards fellow of All Souls, where he took his doctor's degree 1667. He was advocate in doctors' commons, was knighted 1684, and the next year sent envoy extraordinary to France. He was member for East Loo, and afterwards for Oxford university, and in 1695 was appointed secretary of state, but resigned two years after. The time of his death is not fully ascertained. He is described by Burnet as a most able civilian, and a very virtuous man. He is, however, chiefly known as the friend and correspondent of Pope, the poet.

TRYPHODORUS, a Greek poet, whose poem on the destruction of Troy has been printed by Merrick, with an English translation, Oxford, 1742, 8vo.

TUCKER, Abraham, author of "the Light of Nature Pursued," 9 vols. 8vo. published under the assumed name of Search, was possessed of an affluent fortune, and died at his seat, Betchworth castle near Dorking, Surrey, 1775. By his wife, daughter of E. Barker, esq. he had two daughters, one of whom married sir H. St. John. He was an amiable man in private life.

TUCKER, Josiah, an able divine. He was born at Laugharn, Caermarthenshire 1711, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he proceeded D. D. 1759. His first ecclesiastical preferment was a curacy at Bristol, and afterwards he became rector of St. Stephen's, then prebendary of the cathedral, and in 1758 dean of Gloucester. During the American war he drew much of the public attention upon himself by his pamphlets, in which he asserted the necessity of granting independence to the colonies, rather than to attempt to subdue them by arms, and though he was abused by the friends of the minister, his deductions proved prophetically true. As a writer on subjects of government, of commerce, and of politics, his opinion was highly respectable, and ensured him the good opinion of the world. In his celebrated treatise on civil government he opposed the system of Locke, and proved himself no mean antagonist in the field of philosophy and reasoning. He published some sermons, &c. and died at an advanced age 1799.

TULDEN, Theodore Van, a native of Bois-le-duc, eminent as a painter and engraver. His fairs, markets, village feasts, &c. were subjects in which he displayed superior abilities and unparalleled excellence. Some of his historical pieces are much admired, and his engraving of the labors of Hercules by Nicolo possesses merit. He died 1676, aged 69.

TULL, Jethro, a gentleman, descended from an ancient Yorkshire family. He has ever to be celebrated as the first Englishman who bestowed particular attention to agriculture, and endeavoured to reduce it to a regular system, and on consistent principles. He is the inventor of the drill plough. He travelled into France, and visited other parts of Europe, earnestly attentive to the improvements made in agriculture in foreign countries, and he introduced into practice his own plans in his farms in Oxfordshire and Berkshire. Though in some degree baffled by the stupidity and obduracy of his laborers and the mechanics whom he employed, he demonstrated that by careful labor and due arrangement, the ground would produce in the course of 13 years more plentiful crops than by the usual methods of manuring and of fallow. His neighbours who observed the rapid improvements of his land, prevailed upon him to publish his theory, which appeared in 1733. His essay on Horse-hoeing Husbandry, fol. was so popular that it was translated into French by du Hamel. He published other agricultural tracts, and died 3d June, 1740.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS, third king of Rome, after Numa, was successful in his war against the people of Alba and the Latins. He died B. C. 640.

TULLY, Thomas, a native of Carlisle, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he became tutor and fellow. He was in 1642, elected master of Tetbury grammar school, but he soon quitted the appointment for a college life. He was made head of St. Edmund hall 1657, and at the restoration he took his degree of D. D. and became chaplain to the king. He was made dean of Rippon 1675, and died the next year aged 56. He was author of Logica Apodeictica, 8vo. and some other theological tracts, besides controversial pieces against Bull and Baxter on the subject of justification.

TULLY, George, a relation of the preceding, born also at Carlisle, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was author of a Discourse on the Government of the Thoughts, 8vo. — and published a Translation of Plutarch's Morals — of Miltiades' Life by Corn. Nepos, and of Julius Cæsar by Suetonius, with notes. He published besides some sermons and theological tracts. He obtained a prebend of Rippon, and the rectory of Galefield near Newcastle, and the subdeanery of York cathedral. He died 1695, aged 42.

TUNSTALL, James, an able divine, born 1710, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. He was presented 1739, to Sturmer rectory, Essex, and in 1741 elected public orator of the university. He was chaplain afterwards to Potter the primate, who gave him Great Chart.

Chart rectory in Kent. He died universally respected, 28th March, 1772. He wrote Epistola ad Virum Erudit. Conyers Middleton, &c. — Academica, or Discourses on Natural and Revealed Religion — a Vindication of the Power of the State to prohibit Clannish Marriages, &c.

TURBIDO, Francis, a native of Verona, who studied painting under Gorgione and Veronese, and acquired eminence in the execution of historical pieces, in fresco and in oil. His transfiguration is much admired. He died 1581, aged 81.

TURENNE, Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, viscount de, second son of the duke of Bouillon, by Elizabeth daughter of William I. of Nassau, prince of Orange, was born at Sedan 11th Sep. 1611. He was alive from his earliest years to military glory, and found particular delight in reading Curtius on the exploits of Alexander the Great. He learned the art of war under his maternal uncle Maurice of Nassau, and first distinguished himself at the siege of la Mothe in Lorraine, in 1634. In 1635 he reduced with great rapidity the castle of Solre in Hainault, with a garrison of 2000 men, and the next year so signalized himself at the taking of Brisach, that Richelieu admiring his valor, offered him his niece in marriage, an honor which as he was a protestant, he declined. Italy was in 1639, the scene of his valor, and in 1642, he assisted at the conquest of Rouffillon, and two years after in reward for his able services during 17 years under various generals, he was made marshal of France, and appointed commander in chief of the army in Germany. He crossed the Rhine with a small force, and though defeated at Mariendal 1645, he recovered, three months after, at the victory of Northlingen, the honor of his army. In 1645, he re-established the elector of Treves in the possession of his dominions, and the following year he formed an union with the Swedish army under Wrangel, after a march of 140 leagues, and by this masterly manœuvre, obliged the duke of Bavaria to sue for peace. When the duke soon after violated the peace which he had made with France, Turenne again attacked him, and gaining over him the famous battle of Zumarthausen, he obliged him to quit his dominions. In the civil wars which soon after distracted France, Turenne at first embraced the party of the rebellious princes, and was defeated near Rhetel in 1650, by du Plessis-Praslin, but the following year he was reconciled to the court, and obtained the command of the royal army. He was successfully employed in checking the progress of Condé to whom he was opposed, and after some skilful manœuvres on the Loire, the Seine, and the Marne, he went in 1654 to raise the siege of Arras, which was pressed by the Spaniards, and the following year he took Condé, St. Guillan, and other towns. In 1657 he took St. Venant and Mardick, and joined the forces of Cromwell in taking Dunkirk, which was followed by the fall of Oudenarde, Ypres, and other Flemish towns. The peace of the Pyrenees in 1659, put an end to the war between France and Spain, but in 1667, it was renewed, and Turenne, again placed at the head of military operations, had the honor of instructing the king his master in the art of war.

His success was so rapid, that the Spaniards sued for peace the next year, and about this time the general renounced the tenets of the protestants for the catholic faith. In the war against Holland the experienced general took 40 Dutch towns in 22 days, in 1672 and the following year, he pursued to the gates of Berlin the elector of Brandenburg, who had come to the assistance of the Dutch, and obliged him to sue for peace. His conquest of Franche Comté in 1674, occasioned a powerful league in the empire against Lewis XIV. but Turenne, ever active in the service of his master, suddenly marched into the Palatinate, and defeated at Sintzein a German army under the duke of Lorraine, and laid waste the country so effectually, that from the the top of his castle at Mannheim the elector Palatine could see two cities and 25 villages around him in flames. After this campaign, in which more cruelty was exercised than humanity could defend, Turenne retreated to Lorraine, and defeated the Imperialists at Mulhausen, and again in a more terrible battle at Turkheim, and compelled them to recross the Rhine 1675. These disasters did not dishearten the cabinet of Vienna, who determined to place at the head of their armies Montecuculli, a general worthy to oppose the victorious Turenne, and these two illustrious characters were going to decide the valor of their troops and their own superiority near the village of Saltzbach, when the French hero, examining a spot on which to erect a battery, was unfortunately killed by a cannon ball, 27th July 1675, aged 64. This celebrated character, deservedly reckoned as the first general of his age, was honored with a most splendid funeral by the gratitude of his master, and he was buried among the French kings at St. Denys. In 1781 a superb trophy was erected on the very spot where he fell at Saltzbach, by cardinal de Rohan. In the midst of his victories, Turenne was particularly attentive to the comforts of his soldiers; he not only watched for their glory, but their welfare was the greatest wish of his heart. In his private conduct he was modest and unassuming, and when at the treaty of the Pyrenees, the kings of Spain and France introduced to each other the chief persons of their court, Turenne was found concealed among the crowd, and when presented to the Spanish monarch, Philip observed to his sister, Anne of Austria, "that is the man who has made me pass so many sleepless nights."

TURGOT, Michael Stephen, president of the parliament at Paris, was an active and popular magistrate. He contributed much to adorn Paris, and to promote the comforts of its inhabitants. He left three sons, and died 1751, aged 52.

TURGOT, Anne Robert James, an eminent statesman, youngest son of the preceding, was born at Paris, 10th May, 1727. He studied divinity at the Sorbonne, where he pronounced two Latin discourses with great applause, one on the advantages derived from the christian religion, and the other on the progress of the human mind, and at the age of 24, he began a translation of the Georgics of Virgil. His abilities recommended him to the court, and for 12 years he was intendant of Limoges, where he promoted moted commerce and industry, and opened sources of opulence by the making of new roads, and the digging of canals. Called by the favor of Lewis XVI. to the office of comptroller-general of the finances, he devoted himself zealously to improve the resources of the kingdom, and to lessen the burdens of the people without diminishing the revenues of the state. His plans were grand, liberal, and useful; but unfortunately he was opposed by those who were possessed of power rather than of an enlightened mind, and his measures were ridiculed by the profligate and the vicious, who rioted on the miseries of the people, and he at last retired from a situation which he had adorned by his talents and his integrity. His ministry was, indeed, short, but very popular and useful, and he carried into his retirement the good wishes and the regret of the people. He died of the gout, 18th March 1781, aged 49. Memoirs of his life and of his works were published by Condorcet, in 1782, 8vo. He was a warm admirer of the principles of the economists, a society at the head of which was placed Quesnay.

TURNEBUS, Adrian, a French critic, born 1512, at Andely in Normandy. He studied at Paris, and acquired great reputation for his application, learning, and critical knowledge. He taught polite literature at Toulouse, and in 1547 became Greek professor at Paris, where his lectures were most numerously attended. In 1552 he superintended the royal press for Greek books, but resigned three years after. He died 12th June, 1565 leaving his wife pregnant of her sixth child. Not only his extensive erudition, but his amiable manners, entitled him to the general praise which has been bestowed upon his character, and from the Scaligers, Scioppius, Huetius, Montaigne and others, he has been deservedly mentioned as possessing great powers of mind. His works, all in Latin, were printed in one vol. folio, Strasburg 1600, and his Adversaria, an excellent book in 3 vols. folio, Paris. His works chiefly consist of valuable notes on Cicero, Varro, Thucydides, Plato, &c. — Latin poems — translations from Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plutarch, and other authors, &c.

TURNER, William, a native of Morpeth, Northumberland, educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He warmly embraced the tenets of the reformation, and preached to various congregations, till Gardiner jealous of his popularity imprisoned him. When liberated he went to the continent, and took his doctor's degree of medicine at Ferrara. He returned to England, on Edward's accession, and was made dean of Wells, but he went into exile, under Mary, till the elevation of Elizabeth recalled him; and restored him to his ecclesiastical honors. He wrote a treatise on the baths of England, and Germany — a complete Herbal, or History of Plants, fol. — Historia de Naturis Herbarum, Scholiis & Notis Vallata, 8vo. — and other botanical works, and died 1568.

TURNER, Thomas, an able divine, born at Reading, Berks, and educated at St. John's college, of which he became fellow. He was in 1629 made residentiary of St. Paul's, and chaplain to Charles I. whom he accompanied in his expedition to Scotland, and in 1641, he was made dean of Rochester, and soon after of Canterbury. These dignities, and particularly the favor of Charles, rendered him very suspected to the parliament, and during the civil wars, he was stripped of his preferment, with every mark of cruel insult, and meditated ignominy. The restoration replaced him in his ecclesiastical offices, and he died 1672, aged 81.

TURNER, Francis, son of the above, was educated at Winchester school, and New college Oxford, and he afterwards obtained a prebend of St. Paul's, and the deanery of Windsor. He was in 1683, made bishop of Rochester, and the next year removed to Ely, but his opposition to the king's measures rendered him unpopular at court, and he was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths to William, and was consequently deprived of his preferment. He wrote some sermons, besides religious poems, and the life of Nicholas Ferrar, and died in privacy, 1700.

TURNER, Robert, an English divine, who quitted the kingdom to preserve his attachment to the Romish church. He was for some time in the service of the duke of Bavaria, who employed him in negotiations, and he afterwards became canon of Breslaw, and died at Gratz 1597. He wrote commentaries on Scripture and other theological works.

TURPIN F. H. a native of Caen. He became a professor of belles lettres in his native town, and afterwards at Paris, and acquired some celebrity as a writer. He published the lives of the great Condé, and of marshal Choiseul — History of the Government of Ancient Republics, — Life of Mahomet 3 vols. 12mo. — Civil and Natural History of Siam &c. 2 vols. 12mo. — Universal History 4 vols. — History of the Alcoran, 2 vols. — The French Plutarch. He died at Paris 1799, aged 90.

TURRETIN, Benedict, of an ancient family at Lucca, was born at Geneva, where he became professor of theology, and where he died 4th March 1631, aged 43. He wrote a defence of the Genevese translation of the Bible, sermons, &c.

TURRETIN, Francis, son of the above, was born at Geneva, 1623. He was professor of theology at Geneva, 1653, and went in 1661, as envoy from the republic to Holland. He died 28th Sep. 1687. He wrote Institutio Theologiæ Elenctica, 3 vols. 4to. — Theses de Satisfactione J. C. 4to. — De Secessione ab Ecclesiâ Rom. 2 vols. — Sermons, &c.

TURRETIN, John Alphonsus, son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, 1671. In encouragement of his great talents, a professorship of ecclesiastical history was founded for him at Geneva. After travelling over Holland, France, and England much respected by the learned and the great, he died at Geneva 1st May 1737. He wrote, Dissertations 3 vols. 4to. — Sermons — An Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History — treatises on the Truth of the Jewish religion, &c.

TUSSER, Thomas, a native of Raven-hall, Essex, educated at Eton and Cambridge. He was introduced to the court of queen Elizabeth, but he preferred the peace and retirement of a rural life to the intrigues of ambition. His five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry 4to. 1586, is an interesting picture of the agricultural progress made in those days. He died about 1580.

TWINING, Thomas, an elegant Greek scholar, well known known for his translation of the Poetics of Aristotle, in one volume 4to. He was a native of London, and finished his education at Sidney college, Cambridge, where he proceeded M. A. 1763. He was presented to the living of St. Mary's Chichester by Dr. Porteus bishop of London, and he died there in 1804.

Twiss, William, a native of Newbury, Berks, educated at Winchester school and New college Oxford. He became a zealous defender of the tenets of the presbyterians, and was made president of the Westminster assembly of divines, and rector of St. Andrew's Holborn. He wrote Vindiciæ Gratæ Potestatis & Providentiæ Dei, fol. — Four Dissertations de Scientiâ Medicâ, fol. — Riches of God's Love, and other theological works which tended to prove his strong attachment to the doctrines of Calvin. He died 1645.

Tye, Christopher, musical preceptor to Edward VI. and organist of the royal chapel under Elizabeth, was born at Westminster, and educated at Cambridge, where he took his doctor of music's degree 1545. As a musician he was very eminent, and set to music the Acts of the Apostles, and other things. To his diligence in some degree may be attributed the restoration of church music, which had nearly perished with the dissolution of the abbies. The time of his death is not known.

Tyers, Thomas, a writer, known as the friend of Johnson, and as the proprietor of Vauxhall gardens. He was brought up to the bar, but never practised. He possessed some genius and taste, though for his celebrity he was indebted to the partiality of his friends. He died 1787. He wrote some sonnets, pastorals, besides political tracts, &c. 8vo.

Tyndall, William, an English reformer. He was born on the borders of Wales, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he imbibed the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards went to Cambridge, and then settled on the continent that he might with greater security print his translation of the New Testament into English. His translation was well received in England, though the catholics exerted themselves with the aid of a royal proclamation to suppress it. He afterwards translated the five books of Moses, and intended further labor, but the papists of England were so enraged against him that they employed a spy of the name of Philips to betray him, and he was seized as a heretic at Antwerp, where he had fixed his residence. Philips was so active, that though the English merchants in Antwerp interested themselves in his favor, and lord Cromwell wrote for his release, he was condemned to die. He was first strangled, then burnt near Filford castle, 18 miles from Antwerp, 1536. He was a man of persevering spirit, and great zeal as a reformer, and was therefore called the apostle of England. His history is mentioned in Fox's Martyrs. He wrote some other things.

Tyrannion, a surname of Theophrastus a grammarian of Pontus, from the severity of his discipline. He was taken prisoner by Lucullus and came to Rome where he had Cicero and other illustrious Romans among his friends and pupils.

Tyræus, a poet of Athens about 684 B. C. He animated the Lacedæmonians, who were dispirited in their war against the Messenians, and such was the effect of his poetical numbers that they obtained the victory over their enemies.

Tyrwhitt, Thomas, an eminent scholar, born 1730. He was sent from Kensington to Eton, and then entered at Queen's college, Oxford, from whence he was, in 1755, elected fellow of Merton. He was, in 1756, under-secretary at war to lord Barrington, and in 1761 became principal clerk of the house of Commons, which office he resigned, six years after, to Mr. Hatfield. In 1784 he was elected curator of the British museum, and died 1786, universally respected, as well for learning as for gentleness and amiableness of temper, seldom equalled. His works, 12 in number, display labor, as well as taste and judgment. The best known of his publications are Observations on some passages in Shakespeare — Poetical translations of Pope's Messiah, of Philips' Splendid Shilling, into Latin, and Pindar's eighth Isthmian ode into English — Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, 5 vols. 8vo. — Rowley's poems, written by Chatterton, with a vindication against Bryant, the dean of Exeter, and others — de Lapidibus, a Greek poem attributed to Orpheus — an oration of Ixæus against Menecles — Aristotle's Poetics, &c.

Tysilio, a Welsh bard about the 7th century, author of a chronicle of Britain, from which it is said that Geoffrey of Monmouth derived much of his information.

Tyson, Edward, a native of Bristol, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he studied medicine, and took his degrees. Dr. Tyson afterwards settled in London, and acquired a very extensive practice. He became physician to Bethlehem and Bridewell hospitals, and died very suddenly, 1708, aged 58. He was fellow of the royal society, and communicated some valuable papers to its transactions. His works are Phocæna, or anatomy of a porpoise, 4to. — Ephemeræ Vita, or the natural history of the Ephemeron, 4to. — Ourang Outang, or comparison of the anatomy of the Pigmy, the Ape, the Monkey, and Man, &c. 4to.

Tyler, William, an able antiquary, born at Edinburgh 1711. He published the poetical remains of James I. of Scotland, — a dissertation of Scottish music, — an enquiry into the evidence against Mary queen of Scots, &c. an able work, which in reflecting on the conclusions of Robertson and Hume, endeavoured to turn away the tide of unpopularity from that unfortunate queen. This last work passed through several editions. He died advanced in life, and highly respected for his private and public character. He left two sons.

Tzetzes, John, a celebrated grammarian of Constantinople. He shone as a great scholar and a most accomplished man, and it is said his memory was so retentive that he could repeat all the scriptures by heart. He wrote valuable commentaries on the Alexandra of Lycophron, published by Potter, in his edition of that poet, 1697. He wrote also "Chiliades" an elaborate work, — Scholæ on Hesiod, — epigrams and poems — pieces on grammar, &c. — Allegories on Homer, dedicated to the empress Irene who died 1158, which proves the author to have flourished in the middle of the 12th century.

VACHER, N. a native of Moulins, author of Observations on Surgery, 12mo. — Dissertation on Cancers, &c. He died 1760.

VACHET, John Anthony le, a French ecclesiastic, born at Romans in Dauphiné. He devoted the riches which he inherited from his noble family, to charitable purposes, and died 6th Feb. 1681, aged 78, much respected for his works of piety. He wrote various treatises on religious subjects.

VACHET, Peter Joseph de, an ecclesiastic, born at Beaune. He is known as the author of some Latin poetry, of merit, published 1664, 12mo. He died about 1655.

VACQUERIE, John de la, first president of the parliament of Paris, is celebrated for the firmness of his address to Lewis XI. when he wished to enforce some unpopular taxes. Sire, exclaimed he, at the head of the parliament, we resign our offices into your hands, and we are determined rather to endure the severity of your displeasure, than wound our consciences.

VACQUETTE, John, fleur du Cardonnoy, a native of Amiens, known for his knowledge of jurisprudence, but more for his love of literature. He clothed some stories in a poetical dress, and died much respected, Oct. 1739, aged 81.

VADE, John Joseph, a native of Ham, in Picardy, who made amends for the irregularities of his youth by the excellence of his poetical productions. He is the author of that kind of poetry which the French called Poissard, which paints in low, but natural characters, the various occupations of vulgar life. He was, among poets, what Teniers is among painters, and his parodies, songs, bouquets, fables, epistles, &c. possess great merit, with all the vivacity and boldness of the rustic muse. The dissipated life which he led shortened his days, so that he died 4th July, 1757, at the early age of 37. His works have been collected in 4 vols. 12mo.

VADIAN, Joachim, a native of St. Gal, in Switzerland, well acquainted with literature, mathematics, medicine, and philosophy. He was honored with the laurel crown for his literary merits, by the emperor of Germany, and died 1551, aged 66. He wrote, Commentaries on Pomponius Mela, fol. — a treatise on Poetry, and other works in Latin.

VAILLANT DE GUELLIS, or VALENS, bishop of Orleans, was patronized by Francis I., and died at Meun-sur-Loire, 1587, in a good old age. He wrote, a Commentary on Virgil, fol. — a Latin poem, &c.

VAILLANT, John Foy, a celebrated French medallist, born at Beauvais, 24th May, 1632. He studied jurisprudence, and afterwards medicine, in which he took his doctor's degree; but the sight of a number of medals, which a peasant had found in digging in a neighbouring field, roused all his attention, and fixed the bent of his genius. On a visit to Paris he was noticed by Seguin, and other antiquarians, and introduced to Colbert, who patronized him, and engaged him to travel over Italy, Sicily, and Greece, in quest of medals to enrich the king's cabinet. On a second voyage from Marseilles, he was taken by pirates, and instead of visiting Rome, he was carried as a slave to Algiers; but after five months of cruel slavery, he was permitted to return to France for his ransom. At sea, the sight of another pirate threatened fresh slavery; but he determined to preserve the medals which he had collected at Algiers, and swallowed them. He landed soon after at the mouths of the Rhone, and, with some difficulty, nature discharged the favorite medals. Undismayed by former misfortunes, he undertook another voyage, and visited Egypt and Persia, and returned loaded with valuable curiosities. His labors in the cause of science were liberally rewarded by Lewis XIV.; he was made associate of the academy of inscriptions 1701, and soon after pensionary. He died of an apoplexy, 23d Oct. 1706, aged 76. The best known of his works are, Numismata Imperatorum Romanorum, Præstantiora a J. Cæsar. ad Posthumum & Tyranos, 4to. afterwards enlarged to 3 vols. 4to. — Seleucidarum Imperium, &c. 4to. a valuable work — Numismata Ærea Augustorum & Cæsar. in Provinciis, &c. 2 vols. fol. — Numismata Imperatorum, &c. apud Græcos, &c. fol. — Historia Ptolemæorum, &c. fol. — Nummi Antiqui Familiarum Romanorum, &c. 2 vols. fol. — Arfacidarum Imperium, &c. 4to. — Achæmenidarum Imperium, &c. 4to. &c. He contributed also some valuable communications to the memoirs of the academy. His son John Francis was born at Rome, and educated at Paris among the jesuits. He took his degrees in medicine, but studied like his father, the science of medals. He died 17th Nov. 1708, aged 44, of an abscess in the head, occasioned by a fall. He is author of a treatise on the Nature and Use of Coffee, and a Dissertation on the Cabiri.

VAILLANT, Sebastian, a French botanist, born at Vigny, near Pontoise. From organist at a convent at Pontoise, he became surgeon and secretary to Fagon, the king's physician, and by the friendship of this worthy patron, he obtained the place of director of the royal gardens. He enriched the garden by the addition of several curious plants, and, for his services to botany, tany was honored with a seat in the academy of sciences. He published, remarks on Tournefort's institutions of Botany — Botanicon Parisiense, containing an account of the plants which grow near Paris, with 300 plates, published by Boerhaave, fol. — a Discourse on the Structure of Flowers and their use — a small Botanicon, or abridgement of the larger work, in 12mo. He died of an asthma, 22d May 1722, aged 53.

VAILLANT, Walleran, a native of Lisle, eminent as a painter and engraver. He was patronized by the emperor and by the French king, and died at Amsterdam 1677, aged 54. His brother was also eminent as a portrait painter in crayons.

VAISSETTE, Don Joseph, a native of Gaillac, who quitted the office of king's procureur in Albigeois, to embrace the ecclesiastical profession, as member of the congregation of St. Maur at Toulouse. He came to Paris 1713, and applied himself, in company with Claude de Vic, in writing an history of Languedoc, of which the first volume appeared in 1730, folio. After the death of his coadjutor he published four other volumes, and the sixth has been presented to the public by his historical successor Bourotte. He wrote besides, an abridgement of his great work, 6 vols. 12mo. — Universal Geography, 4 vols. 4to., and 12 vols. 12mo. He died at St. Germain-des-prés, 10th April 1756, aged 71.

VALADE, James Francis, a native of Toulouse, known as an intelligent printer and bookseller. He published some valuable catalogues, and died at Paris 24th June 1784.

VALART, Joseph, a native of Hesdin, author of a supplement to the general grammar of Beauzée, 8vo. — and of translations of the New Testament, Cornelius Nepos, &c. He died 1779.

VALAZE, Charles Eleonore Dufriche, a native of Alençon, who after being engaged in the military profession, was called to the bar, and on the breaking out of the French revolution was sent as deputy to the convention. He was violent in his reflections against the unhappy Lewis, but as he was attached to the Girondists, he was soon marked for slaughter by the sanguinary Marat. He was condemned 30th Oct. 1793, at the age of 42, but as the sentence was pronounced, he stabbed himself to the heart and immediately expired. He was an intelligent man on subjects of law, commerce, and agriculture, and published, Lois Penales, 8vo. 1784 — le Reve, conte philosophique — a Mon Fils, 8vo. — Defense des Accusés au 31 Mai, &c.

VALDO, Peter, a native of Vaux in Dauphiné, who became in 1180, the head of a sect called from him Vaudois. Lewis VII. endeavoured in vain to convert these fanatical men to the tenets of the catholic faith, and his son Philip Augustus considering the sword as a more powerful engine of persuasion than the tongue, destroyed their houses, and put above 7000 to the sword. These persecuted men though dispersed through Languedoc, Dauphiné, Bohemia, &c., nevertheless adhered to their principles; and their sect, regarded as the fore-runners of the Calvinists, still maintains their original opinions.

VALENS, Flavius, son of Gratian, shared the imperial throne with his brother Valentinian. He defeated the Goths, but after making a treaty of peace with them, he permitted them to settle in Thrace, in consequence of which they were better enabled to attack their new allies. Valens defeated by these barbarian invaders, was pursued and burnt to death in a tower where he had taken refuge, A. D. 378.

VALENTIN, a Roman, pope after Eugenius II. He died 40 days after his election, Sep. 827.

VALENTIN, a heresiarch of the 2d century. He was an Egyptian by birth, and a follower of Plato's philosophy, but he was so offended because he was refused a bishopric, that he separated from the church, and gave rise to new errors. He maintained after the Gnostics the existence of Æons, whose numbers composed the God-head, and that by them the world had been created, and was still governed. These wild doctrines were spread with rapidity over Gaul and the western world. He died 160.

VALENTIN, Basil, the assumed name of an able chemist in the 16th century, who was a Benedictine of Erford. His works are in German, and so popular that they have been translated into Latin and English. The best known are Currus Triumphalis Antimonii Amsterd. 1671, 12mo. — Azoph of philosophers with the twelve keys of philosophy, 8vo. — Relation des Mysteres des Sept Metaux, &c. 4to. — Testament of Basil Valentin, 8vo.

VALENTIN, Moses le, a native of Colomiers in Brie. He studied painting under Vouet, and improved himself much at Rome, and successfully imitated the manner of Caravaggio. His concerts, players, soldiers, and low scenes are very valuable, as he paints nature with great correctness, and powerful effect. He died in consequence of bathing imprudently when his body was too hot, near Rome 1632, aged 32.

VALENTIN, Michael Bernard, a native of Gießen who studied botany and became professor of medicine in his native town. He died 13th March 1729, aged 72. He is author of, Historia Simplicium Reformata, with 23 plates 1723 — Amphitheatrum Zootomicum, in German, 3 vols. fol. translated into Latin by Becker — Medicina Nova Antiqua, 4to. — Cynosura Materie Medicæ, 3 vols. 4to. — Viridarium Reformatum, fol. — Corpus Juris Medico-legalis, fol. — Physiologiæ Bibliæ Capita Selecta, 4to.

VALENTINE, daughter of John Galeas duke of Milan, married Lewis duke of Orleans, who was basely murdered by the duke of Burgundy. Unable to avenge the death of her lord, she died of a broken heart 5th Dec. 1408, recommending to her children, and especially to John count of Dunois, the natural son of her husband, the vindication of their father's reputation and glory.

VALENTINIAN, I. son of Gratian, rose by his merit to the imperial throne after the death of Jovian, and while he kept the west for himself, he bestowed the eastern empire on his brother Valens. He defeated the Germans, and restored tranquillity to his African provinces. His next expedition was against the Quadi, whose territories he laid waste with fire and sword, and afterwards, when giving an audience to their ambassadors, he, whilst speaking in a fit of passion to them, burst burst a blood-vessel, which proved fatal, 17th Nov. 375, aged 55.

VALENTINIAN, II. son and successor of the preceding, was stripped of his dominions by Maximus. In his distress he applied to Theodosius emperor of the east, who cut off the head of the usurper, 338, and restored him to his throne. He was afterwards strangled by order of Arbogastes his rebellious general, 15th May 392. He was a most virtuous and benevolent prince.

VALENTINIAN, III. Flavius Placidus, son of Constantius, and Placidia, the daughter of the great Theodosius, was acknowledged emperor 425, when six years old. His mother directed the administration during his minority, and though she was obliged to yield Africa to the Vandals, she ably maintained the dignity of the empire, by the valor of her general Ætius. When of age the young emperor gave loose to the most licentious passions, and at last was assassinated by order of Petronius Maximus, to whose wife he had offered violence, 455. He was succeeded by his murderer.

VALERIANUS, Publius Licinius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor of Rome, after Æmilianus 253. He made his son Gallienus his partner on the throne, and after persecuting the Christians, and waging war against the Goths and Scythians, he marched against Sapor king of Persia. The Persians were victorious, and Valerian carried about in derision, was at last ordered by his cruel conqueror to be slayed alive, 263. His skintanned red was hung up in one of the Persian temples in derision of the Romans.

VALERIANUS, Pierius, an Italian writer, born at Belluno in the Venetian states. He was educated by the kindness of his uncle, and studied under Valla and Lascaris, and he acquired such celebrity as a classical scholar, that he was entrusted with the care of the two nephews of Leo X. Though thus patronized by the pope, he had the modesty and firmness to refuse two bishoprics, and remained satisfied with the office of apostolic notary. After the death of his pupils, he retired to the enjoyment of literary ease at Padua, where he died 1558, aged 83. He was author of various treatises on curious and interesting subjects, both in Italian and Latin, and he also published 2 vols. of Latin poems which were possessed of great merit.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, a Latin writer. His entertaining work in nine books containing various anecdotes of great men, is dedicated to Tiberius in whose age he flourished. The best edition is that of Leyden with notes, &c. 2 vols. 4to. 1726.

VALESIO, Francis, a Spanish physician, patronized by Philip II. of Spain. He published, a treatise de Methodo Medendi, 1647 — Controversiarum Medic. & Philos. Libri Decem, 1625, 4to. &c.

VALESIIUS, an Arabian, who in the third century became the head of a new sect. He made himself an eunuch, and recommended the same operation to his followers, to avoid giving loose to those violent passions, which under a warm climate, and with a heated imagination, might tempt them to disobey the precepts of chastity, and endanger their salvation.

VALESIIUS HENRICUS, or HENRY DE VALOIS, a native of Paris, who after studying under the jesuits at Verdun, and afterwards at Paris, and at Bourges, embraced, to please his father, the profession of the law. Literature however had greater charms for him, and he applied himself assiduously to the study of history, and antiquities. He published, at the request of the clergy of the diocese of Toulouse, the ancient ecclesiastical historians, for which he received the honorable reward of a pension from the liberality of his employers, and in 1670 he was appointed, by the king, historiographer of France, with a stipend, in consequence of his publication of Eusebius. His intense application at last proved fatal to his sight, but he relieved his increasing infirmities, by marrying, at the age of 60, a young woman by whom he had seven children. He died 9th May 1676, aged 73. Besides his ecclesiastical historians published Amsterdam 1639, 3 vols. fol. and at Cambridge 1720, he edited, and improved with valuable notes, Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. He was a critic of vast erudition, profound learning, and solid judgment; but in his character peevish, suspicious, and vain. His brother Adrian distinguished himself also as a learned historian, and acute critic. He published Gesta Francorum from 254 to 752, 3 vols. fol. a work of great labor and merit. He published besides, Notitia Galliarum, fol. — a second edition of Ammianus Marcellinus — a Panegyric on the king, &c. He was historiographer to the king with his brother, and also received a pension. He likewise married in his old age, and died July 2d, 1692, aged 85.

VALETTE PARISOT, John de la, grand master of Malta 1557, bravely defended the island against the attacks of Solyman II. and an army of 80,000 men. After a siege of four months, and the loss of 20,000 men, the Turks retreated in dismay, and the Maltese, raised anew, from its ruins, their demolished city, to which they gave the name of their heroic defender. This great patriot died 31st Aug. 1568.

VALETTE, John Lewis de Nogaret, duke d' Epernon, a French general. He was the friend and favorite of Henry III., whom he served with fidelity, and after his death, though for a while attached to the interests of the enemies of the new king, Henry IV. he was reconciled to him, and deserved his confidence. He was loaded with all the honors which the monarch could bestow, and he maintained the same influence in the court of Lewis XIII., in spite of the intrigues of Richelieu, and the jealousy of new favorites. His violent attack upon the person of the archbishop of Bourdeaux, whom he struck, exposed him to the severest censures of the church, but the interference of his friends, and his own submission, restored him to favor. He died at Loches, 13th Jan. 1642, aged 88. His brother Bernard, shared his honors, and distinguished himself in the military service of his country. He was killed at the siege of Roquebrune, near Frejus, 1592.

VALGULIO, Charles, a native of Brescia, in Italy, who published in 1507, a Latin translation of Plutarch's treatise on Music, 4to. He also translated some of the other moral works of Plutarch.

VALIN, René Joshua, a learned native of Rochelle, author of a commentary on the Costume de la Rochelle,

3 vols. 4to. — L'Ordonnance de la Marine, 2 vols. 4to. — Traité des Prises, 2 vols. 8vo. This intelligent writer died 1765.

VALINCOUR, John Baptist Henry du Trouffet de, a French writer, born in Picardy, 1653. He was secretary of marine to admiral de Toulouse at the battle of Malaga, in which he was wounded, and he was appointed by Lewis XIV. his historian in the room of Racine. He died at Paris, 5th Jan. 1730, aged 77, universally respected. He was author of a Letter to la Marquise de . . . 12mo. — the Life of Francis de Lorraine, duke of Guise — Critical Observations on the Œdipus of Sophocles, 4to. besides some translations from Horace's Odes.

VALKENBURGH, Theodore, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. He unfortunately lost all his property in a voyage to the West Indies, and died in indigent circumstances in Holland, 1721, aged 46. His dead game and fruit pieces are admired. There was also an artist of that name, whose fairs, public exhibitions, &c. were much esteemed. He died 1623.

VALLA, George, a native of Placentia, professor of medicine and belles lettres at Venice; died suddenly 1460. He wrote de Expetendis & Fugiendis Rebus, 2 vols. folio, a curious work, now little read.

VALLA, Laurentius, a learned native of Placentia, born 1415. He possessed great powers as a critic, and his severest censures were directed against the barbarism in the Latin tongue, which the ignorance of the age still tolerated. Violent in his remarks, and contentious and contradicting in his character, he raised against himself a host of enemies, and without confining the bitterness of his reflections to subjects of literature, he ventured to attack the traditions of the church, and to declare that in his quiver he had arrows even against Christ himself. He was kindly patronized by Alphonfus, king of Naples, who at the age of 50 learned Latin of him; and when he was persecuted by the virulence of his enemies for the boldness of his opinions before the inquisition, and condemned to be burned alive, he was saved from the flames by the interference of his royal protector, and submitted only to a private correction in the convent of the Jacobines. He was invited from Naples to Rome by Nicholas V. who knew his literary merits, and who relieved his necessities by the honorable grant of a pension. He died at Rome, 1st Aug. 1465, aged 50, after teaching belles lettres and rhetoric with great reputation at Genoa, Pavia, Milan, Naples, and other cities of Italy. Though censured by Poggius and others, Valla has had among his defenders the impartial Erasmus, and if he cannot be exculpated from asperity of language, he yet possesses the merit of indefatigable zeal in the cause of science, of correct judgment, and acute discernment. The following epigram was written upon him by some of those who regarded him as superciliously nice in the choice of words:

Nunc postquam manes defunctus Valla petivit,

Non audet Pluto verba Latina loqui;

Jupiter hunc cœli dignatus parte fuisset,

Censuram linguæ sed timet ille suæ.

His works are, Elegances of the Latin Language, a valuable work, printed Venice, 1471, folio, Paris, 1575, 4to. and Cambridge, 8vo. — treatise against the False Donation of Constantine — History of the Reign of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, 4to. — translations of Thucydides, Herodotus, Homer's Iliad, &c. not of much value — Notes on the Greek Testament — Fables — Facetious Stories — a treatise on Truth and Falsehood, &c. all printed together at Basil, 1540, in folio.

VALLE, Peter della, a native of Rome, who for 12 years, from 1614 to 1626, employed himself in visiting Turkey, Egypt, the Holy Land, Persia, India, and other Eastern countries, of which he published an interesting account in a series of 54 letters. He died at Rome, 1652, aged 66. The best edition of his voyages is that of Rome, 1662, in 4 vols. 4to. which was translated by Carneau.

VALLE'E, Geofroi, a native of Orleans, known for the absurdities and the improprieties of his Beatitude des Chrétiens, a work which drew upon him the severest punishments of the inquisition. He was burnt at Paris, 8th Feb. 1574.

VALLE'E, Simon, a French engraver of merit. His Venus in her car from Troy — the resurrection of Lazarus, by Raphael — Jesus bearing his cross, from Sacchi, are much admired. Lewis XIV. granted him a pension, but the artist, then lying on his death-bed, declined it, exclaiming, "it is too late," and expired.

VALLEMONT, Peter le Lorrain de, an ecclesiastic, who died at Pont-Audemer, his native town, 30th Dec. 1721, aged 72. He wrote Elements of History, 5 vols. 12mo. a work of merit — Curiosities of Nature and Art in the Vegetation of Plants, 2 vols. &c.

VALLIERE, Louise Francoise, duchesse de la, a French lady, born of an ancient family. She was one of the maids of honor to Henrietta of England, the wife of the duke of Orleans, and she became mistress to the voluptuous Lewis XIV. by whom she had a son and a daughter. When the charms of madame de Montespan alienated the affections of her fickle lover, she retired from the distinctions of a court which she had enjoyed with great moderation, tempered with beneficence; to the solitude of a cloister, where for 35 years, she atoned by acts of piety and devotion, for the guilt and the licentiousness of her youth. She died 6th June 1710, aged 66.

VALLISNIERI, Anthony, an Italian naturalist, born at Trefilico, near Reggio. He studied under Malpighi, and was appointed by the Venetian republic professor of medicine at Padua, and on account of his celebrity, was admitted member of the learned societies of Italy, and of the London Royal society. He died 28th Jan. 1730, aged 69. He wrote in Italian, Dialogues on the Origin of various Insects, 8vo. — Experiments on the Worms of the Human Body — Histoire de la Generation de l'Homme & des Animaux, 4to. — de Corpi Marini che su Monti si trovano, 4to.

VALOIS, Vid. VALESIIUS.

VALOIS, Joes de, a jesuit, born at Bourdeaux, 2d Nov. 1694. He became professor of hydrography at Rochelle, Rochelle, and published various useful works. The time of his death is unknown.

VALSALVA, Anthony Marie, a physician, born at Imola. He studied under Malpighi, and taught anatomy with great reputation at Bologna. He died 1723, aged 57. His works are, Anatomical Dissertations in Latin, 2 vols. 4to. edited at Venice, 1740, by Morgagni — de Aure Humanâ, 4to. a valuable composition, the labor of 16 years.

VALVERDA, John, a Spanish physician, the pupil of Realdus Columbus. It is said that he introduced the knowledge of anatomy from Italy into Spain, where he published the Tables of Vesalius with Remarks, &c. in Spanish. Indefatigable more than ingenious, his labors were highly useful in propagating anatomy in Spain. He wrote a treatise on Anatomy, published Venice, 1589 — & de Animi & Corporis Sanitate Tuendâ, 1553.

VANAKEN, Joseph, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His satins, velvets, lace, embroidery, &c. possessed peculiar beauty. He died 4th July, 1749, aged 50. — Another of that name, Arnold, excelled in the representation of small figures, and he published a set of prints of fishes, or the wonders of the deep.

VANBRUGH, sir John, a native of Cheshire, highly distinguished for his poetical talents, and his knowledge of architecture. He was for some time in the army, and in 1697 produced his first play, the Relapse, or Virtue in Danger, which was received with such applause, that the following year he again claimed the public approbation by his Provoked Wife. Soon after his Æsop, a comedy abounding with satire and morality, appeared at Drury-lane, and in 1702 the Falſe Friend. His character was now become so respectable, that he was knighted by queen Anne, and appointed Clarencieux king at arms, and afterwards he held ſucceſſively the offices of ſurveyor of the works at Greenwich hoſpital, of comptroller-general of his majeſty's works, and of ſurveyor of the gardens and waters. Nothing, however, could compenſate the want of economy, and the poet, ſuffering under indigent circumſtances, exerted the powers of his genius to amuſe the town, and to retrieve his fortunes. He had undertaken the building of the new theatre in the Hay-market, but the plan did not ſucceed, though he rapidly produced for public representation, the Triumph of Love — the Confederacy — the Cuckold in Conceit — Squire Treeloby — and the Miſtake. Sir John died of a quinſey, 26th March, 1726. Though ridiculed by Pope, ſir John is yet acknowledged by the ſatiriſt to be a man of wit and of honor. The moſt remarkable monument of his architectural abilities is Blenheim houſe, which, though admired by ſome as a perfect whole, muſt be conſidered as a heavy pile, with ſcarce an apartment of magnitude ſufficiently proportioned to the ſize of a ſplendid manſion, or adequate to the expectations formed at the ſight of a noble edifice raiſed by national gratitude. The dramatic pieces of Vanbrugh, from their wit, eaſe, and vivacity, poſſeſs great merit; but they muſt be condemned for that licentiousneſs, and immoral tendency which, though palliated by the corrupt and indelicate taſte of the times, are yet unbecoming a man of pure virtue, of refined ſenſe, and of honorable principles.

VAN-CEULEN, Ludolph, a mathematician of Leyden, of great merit, in the 17th century. He published Fundamenta Geometriæ, tranſlated by Snellius, 4to. — de Circulo & Adſcriptis, 4to. 1619. The 36 cyphers by which he expreſſed the proportion of the circumference and the diameter of a circle, were, in honor of his laborious calculations, engraved on his tomb in St. Peter's church, Leyden.

VAN-CLEVE, Joſeph, a ſculptor of eminence, the pupil of Anguier. He embellished Marly, Verſailles, Trianon, Paris, &c. with his beautiful groupes, and died at Paris, 1733, aged 89.

VANCOUVEUR, George, an English navigator. He was captain in the navy, and made a voyage in the North Pacific ocean, and round the globe in 1790-5. of which he published an intereſting account in 4to. He died 1797.

VANDALE, Anthony, a Dutch phyſician, born 8th Nov. 1638. From his earlieſt years he ſhewed great fondneſs for literature; but his parents engaged him in commercial purſuits, which at laſt he quitted at the age of 30 to ſtudy medicine. He practiſed with great reputation at Haerlem, where he died univerſally reſpected, 28th Nov. 1708. He wrote Difſertations on the Heathen Oracles, beſt edited 1700, Amſterdam, and ably abridged and improved by la Fontenelle — a treatiſe on the Origin and Progreſs of Idolatry, 4to. — Difſertations on Important Subjects, 4to. — Difſertatio ſuper Ariſteâ de LXX. Interpretibus, 4to.

VANDEN-ECKOUT, Gerbrandt, a painter of Amſterdam, the pupil of Rembrandt. His hiſtorical pieces as well as his portraits poſſeſs great merit. He died at Amſterdam, 1674, aged 53.

VANDEN-VELDE, Adrian, a painter of Amſterdam. His animals, landſcapes, &c. were repreſented with taſte, eaſe and delicacy. He died 1672, aged 33.

VANDEN-VELDE, Iſaiah, a Flemiſh painter, whoſe battles and attacks of robbers are highly admired. He reſided at Haerlem, and afterwards at Leyden, and died about 1640. His brothers, John and William, were alſo eminent artiſts. The former excelled as an engraver, and the latter was particularly commended for his representation of ſea views and ſea fights, for which he was patronized by Charles I. He died in London, 1693. The ſon of William, alſo called William, poſſeſſed the genius and ſupported the reputation of his family. He was patronized by Charles II. and his brother. His water pieces are finiſhed in the high-eſt characters of grace, correſtneſs, and nature.

VANDER-DOES, Jacob, a Dutch painter, who died at the Hague, 1673, aged 50. His animals and landſcapes were highly finiſhed, and as his temper was of a gloomy caſt, he infused the melancholy feelings of his mind into his pieces with peculiar effect.

VANDER-HEYDEN, John, a painter, born at Gorcum. He chiefly excelled in the representation of ruins, temples, diſtant towers, &c. He was correſt in the moſt minute circumſtances, and in an open bible, ble, only four inches high, which was introduced in one of his pieces, the characters of the whole page were perfectly legible. He died at Amsterdam, 1712, aged 75.

VANDER-KABEL, Adrian, a painter and engraver, born at Ryswick, near the Hague. He excelled in sea views and in landscapes, but his coloring was bad. He was in his conduct fond of low company, and as his resources were narrow, he, in one instance, like another Morland, painted a sign to pay his host's reckoning. He died at Lyons, 1695, aged 64.

VANDER-LINDEN, John Antonides, professor of medicine at Leyden, was descended from an ancient and respectable family. His grandfather Henry, who was master of the learned languages, and who, in the Spanish massacre at Naerden, lost several of his relations, was minister at Enckhuysen, and afterwards divinity professor at Franeker, where he died 1614, aged 68. His son Anthony, was rector of Enckhuysen college, and afterwards practised physic at Amsterdam, where he died 1633, leaving Antonides. Antonides, who was born at Enckhuysen, 13th Jan. 1609, studied at Leyden and Franeker, and finished his medical studies at Amsterdam under his father. His abilities were such that for 12 years he filled the professorial chair of medicine at Franeker with universal approbation, and next removed, 1651, to Leyden, where his reputation and success followed him. He died at Leyden, 4th March, 1664. He was distinguished not only as a professor, but as a writer. His works are, de Scriptis Medicis, 8vo. — Selecta Medica, 4to. — editions of Hippocrates, Celsus, and Spigelius.

VANDER MEER, John, a painter of Haerlem, who resided in Italy, and perished in a short excursion on the sea-coast, 1690, aged 62. He was the pupil of Nicholas Berghem, and chiefly excelled in his sea views and landscapes. His brother was also an eminent artist. His representations of animals, especially the wool of his sheep, possessed peculiar grace and spirit.

VANDER MERSCH, general of the insurgents of Brabant in 1789, against the imperial forces, distinguished himself by his valor and prudence. When insulted and betrayed by his countrymen he retired to Brussels, and was imprisoned by his enemies in the citadel of Antwerp. He was afterwards restored to liberty, and died at Antwerp 14th Sep. 1792.

VANDER-MEULEN, Anthony Francis, a painter of Brussels, the pupil of Peter Sneyers. His pieces exhibit all the graces, the spirit, and delicacy of the most admired performances of Teniers. The subjects are chiefly hunting parties, sieges, battles, &c. He attended Lewis XIV. in his military expeditions, and gave an accurate representation of the towns which he besieged and the actions which he fought. He married the niece of le Brun, and Lewis XIV. became sponsor to one of his children. He died at Paris 1690, aged 56. His brother Peter was distinguished as a sculptor. He was in England in 1670.

VANDER-MONDE, Charles Augustin, a physician, born at Macao in China, of European parents. He became censor royal of the university of Bologna, and died at Paris 1762, aged 35. He published a Collection of Observations on Medicine and Surgery 12mo. which were the Origin of the Journal of Medicine — Essay on the Perfecting of the Human Species, 2 vols. 12mo. — Pocket Dictionary of Health, 2 vols. 12mo. &c.

VANDER-MONDE, M. a French mathematician, born at Paris. He studied under Fontaine, and was member of the national institute, and died at Paris 1st Jan. 1796, aged 61. He contributed much to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, in his observations on equations, on music, &c.

VANDER-NEER, Eglon, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. Like his father, who was also a good artist, he chiefly excelled in his representations of nature, and his views by moonlight possessed peculiar merit. He died at Duffeldorf 1697, aged 53.

VANDER-SPIEGEL, a Dutch statesman of great eminence, whose services from 1785 to 1795, tended much to establish order and regularity, and to repress the schemes of political innovators. He left Holland in consequence of the persecution of his enemies, and died an exile at Lingen in Westphalia 1800.

VANDER-ULFT, James, a painter of Gorcum, born 1627. As he painted only for his amusement, his pieces are few, but they possess great merit. He became burgomaster of his native town.

VANDER-VELDE, Vid. VANDEN-VELDE.

VANDYCK, Anthony, a celebrated painter, born at Antwerp 1599. He was the pupil of Rubens, and afterwards travelled into Italy, where he studied the beauties of the Venetian school. On his return to Flanders the reputation of his historical pieces procured him honorable invitations from Richelieu and the court of France, but he preferred the patronage of Charles I. and came to England. The monarch pleased with his merits knighted him and allowed him a pension, and the painter flattered by the favors of the court, and grown rich by the exertion of his pencil, married the beautiful daughter of earl Gowry, and supported the dignity of her rank by the ostentatious display of a magnificent equipage, numerous servants, and a splendid table. He died in 1641, aged 42, and was buried in St. Paul's church, where his monument, on which was inscribed an epitaph by Cowley, perished at the dreadful conflagration of 1666. The most celebrated of his pictures is a Descent from the Cross, preserved in the great church of Antwerp. His pieces in England are numerous but chiefly portraits, and from them he derived a more rapid and substantial remuneration, than from the exertion of his powers on historical subjects. Of all the pupils of Rubens, he, according to Fresnoy, best comprehended the rules and general maxims of his master. He even excelled him in the delicacy of his coloring, and in his cabinet pieces, though his gusto in the designing part was not superior to that of Rubens. His pictures preserve in high perfection the dress and the costume of the times. After his death his widow married a Mr. Price.

VANDYCK, Peter, a Dutch painter. His portraits of the Stadtholder and his family are much admired, and he also excelled in his history and conversation pieces. He was born at Amsterdam, and died at the Hague 1758, aged 78.

VANE, sir Henry, eldest son of sir Henry the secretary of state to Charles I. was born 1612. From Westminster school, he removed to Magdalen hall, Oxford, and afterwards visited Geneva. He displayed on his return sentiments so hostile to the church, that to avoid his father's displeasure he went to New England 1635, but came back to Europe two years after. He soon after married, and by his father's interest obtained the place of treasurer of the navy with sir William Ruffel, but a quarrel with the earl of Strafford, who had assumed in a new created title the name of their family seat, engaged the father and the son in measures of opposition to the government. Eager to ruin his political enemy, Vane united with Pym and the more violent members of the commons, and during the civil wars he ably promoted the views of the republicans, and assisted at the conferences with the king at Uxbridge and in the isle of Wight. Though he disapproved of the violence offered to the king's person, he accepted afterwards of a seat at the council board, but his opposition to Cromwell's usurpation was so determined that he was sent a prisoner to Carisbrook castle. At the restoration, though both houses voted for an act of indemnity in his favor, his conduct to Strafford, and the perseverance with which he had supported the republican cause were not forgotten, and therefore he was arraigned and condemned on pretence of having compassed the late king's death. He was beheaded on Tower hill, 14th June, 1662, and suffered with great firmness and resignation. He is represented by Clarendon as a man of deep dissimulation, of quick conception, and great understanding, but Burnet speaks of him as a fearful man, whose head was darkened in his notions of religion. From his fanatical mode of preaching he and his adherents were called Seekers, and in his writings, which were on moral and theological subjects, he clothed his thoughts in such affected language that his meaning was totally unintelligible. His only son Christopher was created baron Barnard by king William, and he is the ancestor of the present Darlington family.

VAN-EFFEN, Just, a native of Utrecht, known as the translator of Robinson Crusoe, 2 vols. 12mo. — of the Modern Mentor, 3 vols. 12mo. — of Swift's Tale of a Tub, &c. died 18th Sep. 1735.

VAN-EVERDINGEN, Albert, a painter and engraver, born at Alkmaer. His landscapes and water falls possessed peculiar beauty, and especially his agitated seas. He died 1675, aged 54. His brothers John and Caspar who both died 1679, were also eminent artists, whose works are preserved chiefly in their native city.

VAN-HUYSUM, John, a painter, born at Amsterdam 1682. He studied under his father, but instead of seeking reputation in the various branches of his profession, he applied all the powers of his genius in the delineation of flowers, fruit, and landscapes. He was so successful, that in the representation of the down and bloom of fruit, and the varied tints of flowers, no painter ever possessed greater delicacy, more exactness, or more taste in tracing the beauties of nature through all her various refinements. His pieces were so much admired that he sold them for a very high price, and at last only princes and nobles could afford to become purchasers. The violent temper of his wife, and the ill conduct of his son, ruffled his spirits in the last part of life, and produced habits of intemperance and of melancholy, from which he seldom was able to recover. He died at Amsterdam 1749, aged 57. His brothers were also good artists, Juste excelled in the representation of battles, and died at the age of 22, and James, who was an able copyist, died in London.

VANIERE, James, a jesuit, born at Causses in the diocese of Beziers, 9th March, 1664. He studied under Joubert, and soon after being admitted among the jesuits he displayed great poetical powers. The best known of his poems is his Prædium Rusticum, in 16 cantos, a work in imitation of Virgil's Georgics, though not always interesting and free from tedious descriptions. The best edition is that of Paris 1756, 12mo. He wrote besides, eclogues, epistles, epigrams, hymns, &c. and a poetical dictionary in Latin, in 4to. He died at Toulouse, 22d Aug. 1739, aged 76. His nephew, who died at Paris 1768, was author of a Cours de Latinité, 2 vols. 8vo. and also translated some of Horace's odes.

VANINI, Lucilio, a well known atheist, born at Taurozano in Otranto 1585. After studying at Rome, Naples, and Padua, and taking the degree of doctor in civil law, he entered into orders, but soon disregarded divinity for the writings of Aristotle, Averroes, Cardan, and Pomponatius. In the pages of these philosophers it is supposed, that he drew his principles of atheism, which he labored so earnestly to disseminate through Europe. After visiting part of Germany and the Low Countries he came to Geneva, and afterwards passed into England, from which he returned to Italy and next to France, where he propagated his opinions sometimes openly, and sometimes under the imposing garb of the friend of truth and religion. Though for a while patronized by Bassompierre he preferred the freedom of a wandering life, and quitting Paris he gained some celebrity as a professor of physics, philosophy and divinity, at Toulouse. The impious tenets, however, which he instilled into the minds of his pupils, soon drew upon him the public indignation, and he was tried before the parliament and condemned to be burnt as an irreligious and immoral atheist. The sentence was executed 19th Feb. 1619. His works are Amphitheatrum Æternæ Providentiæ. 8vo. 1615 — de Admirandis Naturæ, Reginæ, Dæque Mortalium Arcanis, 8vo. 1616, works which abound with impiety and profaneness — a treatise of Astronomy in MS. The best account of his life is by Durand, 12mo. Rotterdam, 1727.

VAN-KEULEN, John, a Dutchman, who edited the Flambeau de la Mer, 5 vols. fol. Amsterdam, 1687, with a supplement in 1699 in folio. with 160 maps.

VANLOO, John Baptist, a famous painter, born at Aix. He was honored with the patronage of some of the princes of Europe, but he preferred a settlement at Paris, where his pencil was successfully employed on portraits and on historical pieces, which are preserved in the churches and the palaces of France, &c. He died at Aix 1745, aged 61. His sons

Lewis

Lewis Michael, and Charles Amadeus Philip, were also good artists, the former was painter to the king of Spain, and the latter to the king of Prussia.

VAN LOO, Charles Andrew, brother and pupil of the preceding, was born at Nice 1705. After visiting Italy and studying under Lutti, and le Gros, he settled at Paris and became painter to the king, and professor in the academy of painting. He was also made knight of St. Michael. The best of his pieces are a lame man healed by St. Peter, Jesus washing his disciples' feet, the graces, the sacrifice of Iphigenia, &c. He died 15th Feb. 1765, aged 61. His life was written by d'Andre Bardon.

VAN-MENDER, Charles, a native of Courtray, eminent as a landscape and historical painter. He died 1606, aged 58. His best pieces are Adam and Eve in Paradise, and the Deluge.

VANNI, Francis, a painter born at Sienna. He studied the manner of F. Baroque, and of Corregio, and chiefly excelled in devotional subjects. He was also an able architect and good mechanic. He died at Rome 1609, aged 46.

VANNIUS, Valentin, a native of Swabia, who warmly espoused and defended the tenets of the Luthetans in his Judicium de Misa, published at Tubingen 1557, and Missa Historia Integra 1563, 4to.

VAN-OBSTAL, Gerard, a sculptor of celebrity, born at Antwerp. He died rector of the royal academy of painting and sculpture at Paris 1668, aged 73.

VAN-OORT, Adam, a Dutch painter. His landscapes and historical pieces were admired. He died in his native town of Antwerp, 1641, aged 84.

VAN-ORLAY, Bernard, a painter, the pupil of Raphael. He was patronized by Charles V., and died at Brussels 1550.

VAN-OSTADE, Adrian, a native of Lubeck, eminent as a painter. His taverns, stables, &c. possessed great merit. He died at Amsterdam 1689, aged 75. His brother Isaac, was also an artist, but of inferior merit.

VANSOMER, Paul, a native of Antwerp, known as a painter. He was for some time resident in England where his abilities were patronized by the nobility. He died 1621, aged 45.

VAN-SWIETEN, Gerard, a celebrated physician born at Leyden, 7th May, 1700. After finishing his education under the great Boerhaave he left his native country, and declining the liberal offers of patronage in England, settled at Vienna, where he became first physician to the empress Maria Theresa. To an extensive practice he joined the labors of a public professor, and it may truly be said that to his indefatigable zeal and to his enlightened mind, medicine is indebted for its present flourishing state in the capital of Germany. The most celebrated practitioners of Vienna regard him still as the cause of their eminence, and his experiments and his successful mode of treating diseases laid the foundation of that superiority which his school has so justly acquired over the other medical institutions of the continent. Though branded with the appellation of the tyrant of the mind, and the assassin of the body, by those extravagant philosophers of France, whose works he censured with merited severity, it is universally admitted that to encourage merit, and to patronize rising talents, he employed with alacrity the powerful influence which he possessed at the court of the empress. This truly great and virtuous character died 18th June, 1772, leaving two sons. His chief work is Commentaries on Boerhaave's Aphorisms de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis, 5 vols. 4to. Paris, 1771-3, which has been translated separately into French, and also into English.

VAN-TULDEN, Theodore, a painter and engraver, born 1620, at Bois le Duc, and the pupil of Rubens. He chiefly excelled in the representation of fairs, markets, and village sports.

VAN-UDEN, Lucas, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His landscapes are particularly worthy of admiration, as his trees, his figures and other objects are represented with all the delicacy and correctness of nature. He died 1660, aged 65.

VARCHI, Benedikt, a native of Fiesole, who became professor of morality at Padua. He preferred the patronage of Cosimo de Medicis to the honorable invitations of Paul III., and showed himself so correct and elegant a speaker of his native tongue that the Florentines said if Jupiter wished to talk Italian, he would speak the language of Varchi. Though admired and publicly applauded he was not without enemies who censured him, perhaps with justice, for obstinacy of opinion, and for debauchery of morals. He died at Florence 18th Dec. 1666, aged 63. He wrote an History of the Principal Events of his time in Florence and Italy, published Cologne 1721. He wrote besides some poetical pieces called Capitoli, 2 vols. 8vo. offensive for their indelicacy — sonnets, 2 vols. 8vo.

VARDES, Francis René du Bec, marquis de, one of the favorites at the court of Lewis XIV. As he was well acquainted with the debaucheries of his master, he had the imprudence to reveal them to the queen in a letter supposed to come from her mother the queen of Spain, but after procuring the disgrace of the duke of Noailles by fixing the suspicion of this perfidious conduct upon him, he was at last discovered and sent to ignominious exile. He was afterwards pardoned and died at Paris 1688.

VARENIUS, Augustus, a native of Lunenburg, well known for his deep acquaintance with Hebrew, and his extensive learning, as a Lutheran divine. It is said that he could repeat the Hebrew bible by heart, and that he was so conversant with that language that he spoke it with greater fluency than his own. He wrote, among other things, a Commentary on Isaiah, 4to, and died 1684, aged 64.

VARENIUS, Bernard, a Dutch physician, author of a Description of Japan and Siam, 8vo. — and of Geographia Universalis, 8vo. translated into English with notes by sir Isaac Newton, 1672, and from the English translated into French by Puisseux, 4 vols. 12mo.

VARENNE DE FENILLE, P. C. a native of Brescia. He was an intelligent agriculturist, and published observations servations on the causes why fishes die in pools, memoirs on forests, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. He was guillotined at Lyons in consequence of false accusations before sanguinary judges in 1794.

VARGAS, Alphonso, a native of Toledo, who died archbishop of Seville 1366. He was author of commentaries on the first book of the Master of Sentences, fol.

VARGAS, Francis, a Spanish lawyer, employed by Charles V, and Philip II, in various embassies. He protested in his master's name against the transferring of the council of Trent to Bologna, and after being ambassador at Rome he became counsellor of state in Spain, and some time after retired, disgusted with the world, to the monastery of Cifos, where he died about 1560. He wrote on the jurisdiction of the pope and of bishops, a work which gave offence at Rome, — and memoirs of the council of Trent.

VARGAS, Lewis de, a painter born at Seville. He studied for some years at Rome and in the Italian schools, and acquired great celebrity among his countrymen. The best known of his pieces are, a Jesus bearing his Cross, and Adam and Eve, still preserved at Seville. Some of his portraits also possessed superior excellence. He died at Seville 1590, aged 62.

VARIGNON, Peter, a native of Caen, known as an architect and mathematician. He was member of the academy of inscriptions at Paris, and of that of Berlin, and professor of mathematics in the college of Mazarine. This able writer, equally admired for his virtues and his modesty, died suddenly at Paris 22d Dec. 1722, aged 68. He wrote Nouvelle Mecanique 2 vols. 4to. — Conjectures on Gravity, — Elements of Mathematics 4to. — Memoires in the Academy of Sciences, &c.

VARILLAS, Anthony, a native of Gueret, who was patronized by Gaston duke of Orleans, and appointed one of the librarians to the king 1655. He wrote an history of France from the birth of Lewis XI, to the death of Henry III, 15 vols. 4to. — History of the Revolutions in Religion through Europe, 6 vols. 4to. — la Politique de Ferdinand the Catholic, 4to. — la Politique de la Maison d'Autriche, 4to. — Anecdotes of Florence 12mo. and other works which betray great partiality, ignorance, and inaccuracy. He died 9th June 1696, aged 72.

VARIUS, a Latin poet the friend of Horace. He was one of those to whom Augustus entrusted the revision of Virgil's Æneid. Some fragments of his poetry remain.

VARRO, Marcus Terentius, a celebrated Roman writer the friend of Pompey and of Cicero. His treatise de Re Rustica is extant. He died B. C. 29.

VARRO, a poet of Gaul, who wrote a poem on the war of the Sequani, and translated into Latin verses the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius.

VASARI, George, a native of Arezzo, known as a painter, and an architect. He studied under del Sarto and Michael Angelo, but though he paid much attention to the noblest monuments of antiquity, he was deficient in the coloring of his pieces, though his knowledge of architecture was respectable. He was patronized by the Medicis, and published some useful works. His memory was so retentive that at the age of nine he could repeat the whole of the Æneid. He wrote the lives of the most illustrious painters, sculptors, and architects, 3 vols. 4to. 1568, published at Rome 1758. He died at Florence 1574, aged 62. His nephew George published a treatise on painting in 4to. Florence, 1619.

VASCONCELLOS, Michael, a Portuguese statesman, devoted to the interests of the court of Spain. When a conspiracy was formed by the nobles to place the duke of Braganza on the throne of Portugal, this minister, who possessed great talents, but a character cruel and ferocious, was the first sacrificed to the safety and the liberty of the state, and his body was thrown into the street with exultation by his murderers, 1st Dec. 1640.

VASCOSAN, Michael de, a native of Amiens, eminent as a printer at Paris, where he married one of the daughters of Badius. Among the most valuable of his editions are Plutarch's lives and moral works translated by Amyot, 13 vols. 8vo. — Cicero's Works — Diodorus Siculus — Quintilian, &c. He died 1576.

VASSELIER, Joseph, a native of Alsace, who became member of the academy of sciences at Lyons, and administrator of the post, and died there 1800. He is known in France for his poetical pieces, which were published 3 vols. 12mo. but do not always possess delicacy of sentiment, or language friendly to virtue.

VASSOR, Michael le, a native of Orleans, who quitted the congregation of the oratory and retired to England where he embraced the protestant tenets and received a pension from the prince of Orange. He was patronized by the duke of Portland and by bishop Burnet, and died 1718, aged 71. He published an history of Lewis XIII, 20 vols. 12mo. 1710-21 and 7 vols. 4to. 1756. — Treatise on Religion, &c.

VATABLUS, Francis, a native of Gammache in Picardy, made Hebrew professor of the royal college by Francis I. The observations which he made in his lectures on the scriptures were ingenious and learned, and they were presented to the public from the notes of Robert Stephens, and though censured by the divines of Paris, they were applauded by the university of Salamanca. The most correct edition of these valuable commentaries is that of 1729, in 2 vols. fol. Vatablus translated also some parts of Aristotle into Latin, and he encouraged Marot in the completion of his version of David's psalms. He died 1547.

VATTEL, N. a native of Neuchatel in Switzerland, author of some valuable treatises on metaphysics and jurisprudence. The best known of his works is the Right of Nations, or the Principles of the Natural Law applied to the conduct of nations and of sovereigns, 1758, 2 vols. 4to. From this composition which abounds with singular ideas of modern philosophy, and treats religion as merely a political system, the author has derived great celebrity, and ranks with Grotius and Puffendorff, among the most intelligent writers on subjects of legislation, and of general policy. It is said that in consequence of the popularity of his work he applied in 1765, to the Austrian government to introduce a reformation in the public administration of affairs at Brussels, but his solicitations were received not only with indifference but jealousy by Maria Theresa. He died about 1770.

VAVASSEUR, Francis, a jesuit, born at Paray in the diocese of Autun 1605. After teaching rhetoric and belles lettres for seven years, he came to Paris, where during 36 years he read lectures on the Holy Scriptures, and cultivated poetry and classical literature. He died at Paris 14th Dec. 1681. He wrote de Ludicra Dictione, 1658, a work of great merit, in which, with fine criticism and deep and learned research, he asserted that the Greeks and Romans knew nothing of the burlesque style — de Epigrammate, 1669, a work opposed and censured by Rapin another jesuit, who declared that an epigram is the most insipid of all poetry except it be admirable, and that the composition is so rare, that to make an excellent one is sufficient for the whole of a man's life. He published besides, Job, a heroic poem — the miracles of Jesus Christ, a poem — Elegies — Epic poetry — 3 books of Epigrams — a Commentary on Job, &c.

VAUBAN, Sebastian le Prestre, Seigneur de, a celebrated French engineer. He was born 1st May 1633, and early entered into the Spanish army, under Condé. He was taken prisoner by the French and prevailed upon by the interest of Mazarine to enter into the service of the French king, and he soon distinguished himself at the sieges of St. Menchould, Stenai, Landrecies, Valenciennes, Montmedi, &c. His abilities were seen and acknowledged by the government, and his superior knowledge of fortifications, and of the defence of towns was employed in raising impregnable ramparts around the French monarchy. He was honorably appointed governor of Lille which he had strongly fortified, and his genius next planned citadels for the defence of Verceil, Verue, Turin, &c. In the wars of 1672, and of 1683, he contributed much to the glory of the French arms and the victories of Lewis XIV. by the manner in which he conducted the sieges of the towns of Flanders; and for his many and eminent services, he was rewarded with the rank of marshal of France. This illustrious character, who had during his laborious and useful life been engaged in 140 actions, had conducted 53 sieges, had assisted in repairing the fortifications of 300 ancient citadels, and had erected 33 new ones, died 30th March 1707, aged 74. Immortalized as an engineer, he was remarkable for his attachment to his country, and for his heroism in danger, and in the midst of victory he displayed the man of benevolence and humanity. From the suggestions of an active mind always eager to add to his knowledge and to increase his resources of information, he had collected 12 large MS. volumes of observations, thoughts, &c. which he called his Oisivetés. His works are a treatise on Fortification, or the French Engineer, 8vo. — new treatise on the Attack and Defence of Places, 8vo. — Essays on Fortification, 12mo. — Project of a Royal Tythe for abolishing the Established Taxes, and by other means encreasing the Public Revenue, 4to. — Political Testament of M. Vauban, 12mo. — He was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and his eulogy was pronounced by Fontenelle. He left only two daughters who were both married.

VAUCANSON, James de, a native of Grenoble, celebrated in France for his knowledge of mechanics. He constructed with wonderful ingenuity various automata, and improved and simplified the machinery of silk-mills, and advanced the interests of commerce and of science by many other curious and useful inventions. He declined the honorable offers of a settlement and a pension from Frederic king of Prussia 1740, and died at Paris, 21st Nov. 1782, aged 73.

VAUGELAS, Claude Favre lord de, a native of Bourg in Bresse. He was member of the French academy, and was engaged in the completion of their famous dictionary. In his style he was unusually elegant and accurate, and his translation of Quintus Curtius, 4to. in which he was employed for 30 years, was regarded in his time as the most correct composition in the French language, so that Balzac, a judge of literary merit, said that the Alexander of Curtius was invincible, and that of Vaugelas inimitable. He wrote besides Remarks on the French language, afterwards enriched with the notes of T. Corneille, 3 vols. 12mo. He died 1650, aged 65, in indigent circumstances, though he had received a pension from the king; but his attachment to the fortune of Gaston duke of Orleans, to whom he was chamberlain and companion, embarrassed and ruined his affairs.

VAUGHAN, sir John, an English lawyer, author of "reports" published by his son Edward. After the restoration Clarendon offered him his patronage, but he refused it, and soon after joined his enemies, and was raised to the office of chief justice of the common pleas. Though a man of abilities, he was haughty and overbearing, and more admired for his talents, than beloved for his courteous manners. He died 1674, and was buried in the Temple church, near the remains of his friend Selden.

VAUMORIERE, Peter Dortigue Sieur de, a French writer born at Apt, in Provence. He was an intelligent writer, pleasing in his conversation, and beloved by his friends. He died 1693. He wrote, l'Art de Plaire dans la Conversation, 12mo. — Lettres, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. — le Grand Scipion, 4 vols. 8vo. — Diane de France, 12mo. — Adelaide, and other romances, &c.

VAUVENARGUES, Luke Chapier de, a French writer of Provence, who died 1747, aged 35. He lost, in his youth, his eye-sight by the small-pox, and supported the rest of his life, in the most christian resignation, in the midst of his friends and family. His introduction to the knowledge of the Human Mind, with reflexions, and maxims, 12mo. possesses merit. This and others of his works, were republished by Fortia, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1797.

VAUVILLIERS, John Francis, professor of Greek, for 20 years, in the royal college of France, struggled through the storms of the revolution, and at last, when proscribed, fled from the country. In his voluntary exile, he was invited by Paul I. to Russia, but the climate of Petersburg proved too rigorous for his delicate constitution, and he died there 23d July 1800, aged 64. He published, Essay on Pindar, 12mo. — letters on Horace, 12mo. — Examen Historique of the Spartan government — notes to Brotier's Plutarch, &c.

VAUX, Nicholas lord, son of sir William Vaux of Harrowden, Northamptonshire, after finishing his university education, distinguished himself at the battle of Stoke, near Newark 1487, and was knighted on the occasion. He continued such a favorite at the court of Henry VIII. that he attended his master in his interview with Francis I., and was afterwards raised to the rank of baron. He wrote poems called the Paradise of Dainty Devices, and died in Northamptonshire, 1522.

VAUX, Noel Jordan de, a French general, descended from a noble family in Gevaudan. He early embraced the military profession, and distinguished himself by his valor and discipline in the wars of Italy. He was at the battles of Parma and Guastalla, of Fontenoy and Rocroux, and at the sieges of Prague, Oudenarde, and Bergen-op-Zoom, at which last place he was wounded by the bursting of a shell. In 1769 he was made governor of Corsica, and completed the conquest of the island; but in his administration he was charged with cruelty and oppression, though the French defended his conduct as just and politic. He was, in consequence of his many services, raised to the dignity of marshal of France, 1783, and in 1788 he was sent to Dauphiné to quell the troubles of that province. He died the same year, 14th Sept. at Grenoble, aged 83. He had been present at 19 sieges and 14 battles. He left two daughters.

UBALDINI, Petruccio, a celebrated illuminator on vellum. The book in which he wrote, and illuminated, in beautiful letters, various sentences from scripture, at the request of Nicholas Bacon, for the use of lady Lumley, has been long preserved in the library of Gorhambury. He died about the middle of the 16th century.

UBINO, John d', an Italian painter, the disciple of Raphael. His animals and landscapes were much admired. He died 1564, aged 70.

VECELLI, Francis, a native of Cadore, the brother of Titian, and also himself an able artist. His brother, who saw the genius with which he executed his pieces, dreading in him a powerful rival, persuaded him to apply himself to commercial pursuits. His nephew Horace, the son of Titian, was also an eminent artist, some of whose pieces are attributed to the pencil of his father. He died young, of the plague, 1576.

VEENINX, John Baptist, a native of Amsterdam, distinguished as a painter. He was the pupil of Abraham Bloemaert, and he painted, with great spirit and success, historical pieces, landscapes, flowers, animals, portraits, &c. He died near Utrecht, 1660, aged 39.

VEGA, Lopez Felix de, a Spanish poet, born of a noble family at Madrid, 25th Nov. 1562. From an humble office in the bishop of Avila's household, he entered at the university of Alcalá, and afterwards became secretary to the duke of Alva. He embarked in the celebrated Armada of Philip II. to invade England, but escaped the dangers of the sea, and of war, though his brother perished in the expedition. He next was in the service of the count of Lemos, and though unfortunate in the levities, and the immoral conduct of his first wife, he took another, whose early death so deeply affected him, that he quitted the world. When admitted into orders, Urban VII., in reward of his great poetical celebrity, bestowed on him the degree of D.D., the cross of the order of Malta, and a lucrative office in the apostolic exchequer. He died 27th Aug. 1635, aged 72. His compositions are very numerous, and form upwards of 70 volumes of prose and lyric pieces. His muse was so prolific, that he often wrote a play in the course of one day, and some of his comedies even in the short space of five hours, and in a style correct, elegant, and animated. His dramatic pieces were so popular and successful, that he acquired by them above 150,000 ducats. His poetical pieces are said to amount to the number of 1800.

VEGETIUS, Flavius Renatus, a Latin writer, author of Military Institutions, which give a satisfactory account of the Roman tactics. He wrote also a treatise on the Veterinary Art, preserved in the Rei Rusticæ Scriptores, 2 vols. 4to. Leipzig. His institutions, which are written in very elegant Latin, are best edited at Paris, 2 vols. 4to. 1783, with Turpin's Commentaries. They have been translated into French by Bourdon. He flourished in the fourth century, and in Valentinian's reign.

VEIL, Charles Marie de, son of a Jew at Metz, was converted to Christianity by Bossuet, and entered among the Augustines, and became canon of St. Genevieve. After giving public lectures on theology at Angers, and in other universities, he came to England 1679, where he abjured the catholic faith, and after marrying the daughter of an anabaptist, became a preacher of that persuasion. He wrote, Commentaries on Matthew and Mark, 4to. — on the Acts of the Apostles, 8vo. — on Joel, 12mo. — on the Song of Solomon, and the Minor Prophets. He died about the end of the century. His brother Lewis was also a protestant, and became known as the author of Catechismus Judæorum in Disputatione & Dialogo Magistri & Discipuli, a R. A. Jagel Monte Silicis Oriundo, Hebrew and Latin, 1679, and other works.

VELASQUEZ, Don Diego de Sylva, a Spanish painter, the pupil of Herrera and Pacheco. He was born at Seville, and died at Madrid, 1660, aged 66. His abilities were noticed by Philip IV. who appointed him his first painter, knighted him, and bestowed on him a liberal pension, and, on his death, honored his remains with the most magnificent obsequies in the church of St. John at Madrid. His pieces are preserved in the churches and palaces of Spain, and one of the most celebrated is the representation of a man returning from a well, with bare breast, and giving water to drink to a little boy.

VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, a Roman historian, in the age of Tiberius. He was author of an elegant epitome of Grecian and Roman history, part of which only is extant. As he was the friend of Sejanus, it is supposed that he shared the disgrace and the misfortunes of that guilty favorite.

VELLUTELLO, Alexander, a native of Lucca, author of some commentaries on the works of Dante and of Petrarch. The best edition of these works, which were once much esteemed in Italy, is 1545, in 4to. He died at the end of the 16th century.

VELLY, Paul Francis, a jesuit, born near Nismes, in Champagne. He wrote an History of France, of which he completed only 8 vols. in a plain but correct stile, with every mark of candor and accuracy. He died 4th Sep. 1759, aged 48.

VELSERUS, Mark, a native of Augsburg, distinguished as a civilian, and author of Rerum Augusto-Vindelicarum, Libri octo. fol. — Rerum Boicarum, Libri quinque, 4to. He died 13th June, 1614, aged 56.

VELTHEIM, A. F. count, a native of Brunswick, appointed in consequence of his knowledge of mineralogy, superintendant of the mines of Hartz, and made a count by the king of Prussia, and doctor of laws in the university of Helmstadt. He wrote Dissertations on the Formation of Basaltes — on the vases of the Antients — on Memnon's Statue — on the Barberini Vase — on making Glass, and other valuable works. This ingenious man died 1801.

VELTHUYSEN, Lambert, a native of Utrecht, who studied medicine, and philosophy, and was an able defender of the opinions of Descartes against Voet. He died in retirement 1685, aged 63. His works, consisting of theological, philosophical, and medical pieces, have been collected into 2 vols. 4to.

VENCE, Henry Francis de, a French ecclesiastic, author of some Dissertations and Analyfes on the Old Testament, much and deservedly commended by Calmet. This pious author was preceptor to the children of the duke of Lorraine, and died at Nancy, 1st Nov. 1749.

VENDOME, Cesar, duke de, son of Henry IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrees, was made governor of Bretagne by his father, whose courage and virtues he inherited. He died 1665, leaving two sons and a daughter. His grandson Louis Joseph, also duke of Vendome, who was born 1st July, 1654, was distinguished as an able warrior. His valor was first displayed at the taking of Luxemburg, Mons, and Namur, and when raised to the rank of general, he was sent into Catalonia, where he took Barcelona, 1697. In 1702 he was sent to Italy to succeed Villeroy, who had been unfortunate, and his presence turned the tide of victory in favor of the French. The imperialists were defeated at St. Vittoria, and Luzara, Mantua was relieved, Savoy was invaded, Eugene was defeated at Cassano, at Reventlau, and Calcinito, and Turin was going to open its gates to the conqueror, when he was recalled to head the armies in Flanders. From Flanders he passed to Spain, and Philip V. who had neither troops nor resources, soon saw himself surrounded with soldiers at the call of his generous defender, and replaced on his throne at Madrid. The English forces were next pursued by the active Vendome, and lord Stanhope, and his army of 5000 men, surrendered prisoners of war, and on the morrow, 10th Dec. 1710, Stahremberg and the imperialists were defeated at the battle of Villaviciosa. These important services were honorably rewarded by the gratitude of Philip, who created him prince of the blood, and bestowed on him the most valuable presents. Vendome continued his services against the imperialists in Spain, but died suddenly of an indigestion at Tignaros, 11th June 1712, aged 58. His remains were magnificently interred in the Escorial, and the Spanish nation put on mourning in honor of his meritorious services to their monarch.

VENDOME, Philip de, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, 23d Aug. 1655. He distinguished himself in the army under Lewis XIV. in the conquest of Holland, at the passage of the Rhine, and at the sieges of Maestricht, Valenciennes, Cambray, &c. He afterwards served with honor under his brother in Catalonia, but he fell under the displeasure of the French king for not having joined the army at the celebrated battle of Cassano. He retired to Rome, but afterwards returned to France, and died at Paris, 24th Jan. 1727, aged 72.

VENEL, Gabriel Francis, a native of Pezenas, known as an able and intelligent physician, and professor of medicine at Montpellier, where he died 1776, aged 53. He wrote an Account of the Mineral Waters of Passi — Instructions on the Use of the rouille — Analysis of the Waters of Seltz, &c.

VENERONI, John, a native of Verdun, in the 17th century, who altered his name of Vigneron to the Italian word Veneroni. He taught Italian at Paris with great success, and contributed much to render the Italian poets popular in France. He wrote Method to learn Italian, 12mo. 1770 — a Dictionary, French and Italian, 4to. 1768 — Fables Choieses — Letters of Loredano — Bentivoglio's Letters, &c.

VENETIANO, Dominic, a Venetian painter. He was basely murdered by Castagno, to whom he had communicated the secret of painting in oil, then first introduced into Italy.

VENETTE, Nicolas, a French physician, who died at Rochelle, his native town, 1698, aged 65. He wrote treatises on the Scurvy — on the Human Calculus — Tableau de l'Amour Conjugal, with plates, 2 vols. 12mo. a work of licentious tendency.

VENIERO, Dominic, a Venetian noble, known as a poet. His Puttana Errante, in three cantos, is a composition very dishonorable to his character as a moral man. He had also three brothers, Jerome, Francis, and Lewis, who wrote some poetry and some prose works. He died 1581.

VENIUS, or VEEN, Otho, a painter of Leyden, who studied at Rome under Zuccharo. He was patronized by the emperor, and by the German electors, and from his attachment to his native country, he declined the liberal offers of Lewis XIII. He settled at Antwerp, and afterwards retired to Brussels, where he died 1634, aged 78, leaving two daughters, who inherited his great abilities. He was well acquainted with the clero obscure, and very correct and animated in his pieces, the best of which are his Triumph of Bacchus, and the Last Supper, preserved in the cathedral of Antwerp. He was the master of the celebrated Rubens. He published Bellum Batavicum ex Tacito, with plates — Horace, with plates — Amorum Emblemata, 4to. — Emblemata Ducenta, &c.

VENN, Henry, a native of Barnes in Surrey, educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He became fellow of Queen's, and in 1759 obtained the living of Huddersfield, Yorkshire, which he exchanged in 1770 for Yellings, Huntingdonshire. He published Sermons on various Subjects, 8vo. — Mistakes in Religion Expofed, 8vo. — the Complete Duty of Man, and other tracts in which he showed himself strongly attached to the doctrines of Calvin. He died at Clapham, 1796, aged 71.

VENNER, Tobias, author of Via Recta ad Longam Vitam, a popular work — of a treatise on the Bath Waters — and of a Censure on British Water, was a native of Petherton, near Bridgewater. He studied medicine at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, and took his doctor's degree 1613, after which he settled at Bridgewater, and afterwards at Bath, where he died respected, 27th March 1660, aged 83.

VENNER, Thomas, a wine-cooper, who, not satisfied with the business of his profession, became a fanatical preacher, and persuaded his followers, who were called fifth monarchy men, that all human government was soon to cease, to make room for the coming of Christ and his saints. From preaching he proceeded to violence, and after representing Cromwell and Charles II. as usurpers, he headed a mob, and proclaimed the kingdom of king Jesus. This popular insurrection called for the interference of the civil power, and Venner and 12 of his followers, who considered themselves as invulnerable, were executed Jan. 1660-1, exclaiming, "that if they were deceived, the Lord himself was their deceiver."

VERDIER, Anthony du, a native of Montbriffon in Forez, who died 25th Sept. 1600, aged 56. He was historiographer of France, and author of Bibliothèque des Auteurs François, and other works.

VERDIER, César, a native of Molières, near Avignon, eminent as an anatomical professor. He was in his character an amiable and benevolent man, and died at Paris, 19th March, 1759. He wrote an Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo, published with the notes of Sabatier — Memoirs on the Hernias of the Bladder — Medical Observations, &c.

VERDUC, Laurence, an able surgeon of Toulouse. He was a popular professor on surgery, and died at Paris, 1695. He wrote an excellent treatise on Healing by Means of Bandages, &c. His son John Baptiste, was a physician, and wrote the Operations of Surgery, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

VERE, Edward, earl of Oxford, received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge, and was one of the judges in the trial of the unfortunate Mary of Scotland, 1588. He displayed great valor and judgment in the destruction of the Spanish armada, and was also admired for his poetical talents. Some of his poems are preserved in Percy's Reliques, and in England's Parnassus, printed 4to. 1600. He died 1604.

VERE, sir Francis, an English general. He served under Leicester in the English expedition to Holland, 1585, and was made governor of Flushing in 1596. He greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, at the battle of Nieupoort, in the defence of Ostend, and against the Spaniards. He died governor of Portsmouth, 28th Aug. 1608, aged 54, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His brother Horace, served under him on the continent, and also shared his honors by his bravery at the battle of Nieupoort. He was intrusted by James I. with the forces sent to the assistance of the duke palatine, and his retreat from Spinola, the Spanish general, was regarded as a most glorious exploit. He was created baron Tilbury by Charles I. in reward for his meritorious services, and he died 2d May, 1635, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

VERELST, Simon, a Flemish painter, who resided for some time in England, and excelled in the representation of fruits and flowers. He died 1710. — A woman of that name, was also eminent for her knowledge of music and painting, and the facility with which she spoke the several languages of Europe. She was born at Antwerp, 1680, and she settled in England, where her pencil was engaged with success in historical pieces and portraits.

VERGENNES, Charles Gravier, count de, a French statesman, born of a noble family in Burgundy. His abilities recommended him to the court, and in 1755 he was sent as ambassador from France to Constantinople, where his good conduct and sound policy merited the thanks of his master, and the friendly approbation of Maria Theresa, and of Catherine of Russia. He was sent in 1771 ambassador to Sweden, and promoted the revolution which made Gustavus master of his country, and on the accession of Lewis XVI. to the throne, he was recalled to share in his councils as minister for foreign affairs. Whilst he spread the influence of France through Europe, he eagerly promoted general tranquillity, and the peace of Teschen, the reconciliation of the emperor and the Dutch, and the commercial treaty with Russia, are important proofs of his wisdom and sagacity. In his politics towards the English government he, however, greatly erred, and by supporting the American colonies against the parent country, he laid the foundation of a system which hurled his master from his throne. His treaty of peace with England in 1783, was followed by a commercial treaty, which proved beneficial to both countries. He died at Versailles, 13th Feb. 1787, aged 68, and was magnificently buried by the order of Lewis XVI. who shed tears of regret and affection on the ashes of his favorite minister. An Historical and Political Memoir on Louisiana, 8vo. published 1802, has been attributed to him.

VERGER DE HAURANE, John du, abbé de St. Cyran, an eminent French ecclesiastic who was born at Bayonne 1581. He obtained in 1620 the abbey of St. Cyran, and by reading the works of the fathers and the History of Ancient Councils, he formed a new system of faith. At Paris his insinuating manners, his learning, and his virtues procured him adherents, and while he regarded confession as useless, and absolution unavailing, except it was attended with the total reformation of the penitent sinner, he failed not to inculcate that confirmation was a more important and more powerful ceremony than baptism, or the sacrament of the lord's supper. His maxims, though committed only to the secrecy of tried friends, soon became popular, and at last drew upon him the jealousy and resentment of Richelieu who caused him to be imprisoned in 1638. The death of his persecutor restored ed him to liberty, but he soon after himself fell sick, and died at Paris 11th Oct. 1643, aged 62. His works are la Somme des Fautes, &c. de Garasse, 3 vols. 4to. — Spiritual letters, 2 vols. 4to. — Apology for Roche-Posay, &c. — Question Royale. Among the friends and pupils of St. Cyran were Janfenius, Arnauld, Nicole, Pascal, &c.

VERGIER, James, a native of Lyons, who possessed great poetical talents, and was patronized by Colbert. His fondness for dissipated and licentious pleasures, however, stood in the way of his advancement. He was shot dead at Paris by some robbers in the night of the 23d Aug. 1720, aged 63. His works are odes, sonnets, madrigals, epigrams, fables, parodies, &c. edited together 2 vols. 12mo. 1750.

VERGNE, Louis Elizabeth, de la, a French general, born at Mans, 1705. He was the friend of Voltaire, Fontenelle, and other learned men, and shared the glories of the campaigns of Lewis XV. in Flanders. He died at Paris 31st Oct. 1782, aged 77. His works are numerous, consisting chiefly of romances, &c.

VERGNIAUD, Peter Victorin, a native of Limoges who left his profession of advocate at Bourdeaux, to attend the meeting of the national assembly. With commanding eloquence he recommended the violent measures against the emigrants, he proposed the suspension of the monarch, and suggested the convoking of a national convention. By degrees, however, his virulence abated, and in the convention he showed himself moderate and the friend of order, but his views did not escape the penetration of Robespierre, who saw in him a powerful rival aspiring to the sovereign power. He was accused before the revolutionary tribunal, and sent to the scaffold. He suffered 31st Oct. 1793, aged 35.

VERHEYEN, Philip, son of a peasant at Verrebrouck in Waes, was born 1648. After working in the fields with his father till the age of 22 he was drawn from this low occupation by the curate of the parish who observed the superior powers of his mind, and he made such rapid progress at the college of Louvain, that he soon obtained the degree of doctor of medicine, and a professorship of anatomy. He published Treatise de Corporis Humani Anatomia, 2 vols. 4to. translated into German, — de Febris, and other medical works. This worthy character died at Louvain 18th Feb. 1710, aged 62, universally regretted, leaving by his second wife four children, who inherited little besides their father's reputation.

VERKOLIE, John, an eminent painter and engraver of Amsterdam, who died at Delft 1693, aged 43. His Venus and Adonis, his tempest, his kneeling penitent, and particularly his pieces on which little light is thrown, are particularly admired.

VERMANDER, Charles, a native of Meulebeck in Flanders, known as a painter and a poet. He died 1607, aged 59. His landscapes and grotesque pieces were deservedly admired. He wrote a poem on painting, — figures of antiquity, — lives of celebrated painters, &c.

VERMEYEN, John Cornelius, a painter born near Haerlem. He was furnished the Bearded, because he wore his beard so long that it touched the ground.

He was patronized by Charles V., whom he accompanied in his Tunis expedition. He died at Brussels 1559, aged 59.

VERNES, Jacob, a native of Languedoc who died at Geneva where he was minister 1788, aged 60. He wrote la Confiance Philosophique, 2 vols. 8vo. — Choix Literaire, 24 vols. 8vo. — Letters on Rousseau's Catechism, — an elegant work on the death of his wife, &c.

VERNET, Joseph, a native of Avignon, who from a common cart painter became the first marine artist in France. He visited the different sea ports of France which he painted with astonishing effect. He died at Paris Dec. 1789, aged 77, and it has been said of him that his genius had neither infancy nor old age.

VERNEUIL, Catherine Henrietta de Balzac Marquise de, a French lady who so captivated the heart of Henry IV. that he promised to marry her. When the monarch gave his hand to Mary de Medicis, this haughty mistress was so offended that she conspired with the Spanish court to dethrone him, and to place the crown on the head of her own son, whom she had borne to Henry. Their intrigues were discovered, and her accomplices punished. She died in exile 1633, aged 54.

VERNEY, Guichard Joseph du, professor of anatomy in the royal gardens, was born at Feurs en Forez, 5th Aug. 1648. He acquired great celebrity at Paris, as a professor, and died there 10th Sep. 1730. He wrote an excellent treatise on the Ear, 12mo. &c. His works appeared together in 2 vols. 4to. 1762.

VERNON, Edward, an English admiral, born at Westminster. After serving with distinction in the navy, he was sent 1739, against Porto-Bello, which he took, and with a small force, as he had often boasted in the house of Commons, but he was unsuccessful in his attack on Carthagea two years after. His name is beautifully introduced in the most pathetic lines written by Thomson. He died suddenly, 29th Oct. 1757, aged 73.

VERNULÆUS, Nicholas, professor of belles lettres, at Louvain, was author of a Latin history of Louvain university, 4to. — Historia Austriaca, 8vo. — Latin Tragedies, — and Institutiones Politicæ. He died at Louvain 1649, aged 79.

VERONESE, Paul Caliari, a celebrated painter born at Verona 1532. He studied under his uncle and soon acquired such reputation as to rival Tintoret and the most illustrious artists. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of Cana, and the supper in the house of Simon the leper. From the rich resources of a strong imagination he painted with all the truth of nature, his characters were represented with dignity, his female figures exhibited grace and elegance, and in his draperies appeared splendor and magnificence. In commendation of his great abilities Guido said that he wished to be what Veronese was rather than acquire the celebrity of any other artist, for as he observed, others display their art, but he paints nature in all her real charms. This admired painter, equally great as a good christian and as an amiable man, died at Venice 1588, aged 51.

VERONESE,

VERONESE, Alexander Turchi, a painter born at Verona. In his pieces he drew the beauty of his female figures from the charms of his wife and daughters. He died at Rome 1670, aged 70. As he suffered much from indigence in consequence of the luxurious extravagance of his wife, many of his pieces were hastily finished.

VERONESE, Carlo, a Venetian who acquired some reputation at Paris as an actor, and as a dramatic author. He died 1760, aged 58. His daughter Anna was also eminent as an actress and an elegant dancer on the French stage.

VERROCHIO, Andrew, a native of Florence, who united in his own person the various knowledge of the painter, the goldsmith, the geometrician, the sculptor, the engraver, &c. He first introduced the art of taking casts in plaster of the faces of dead or living persons. His heads of Alexander, Darius, &c. in bronze are much admired, but his paintings possessed not equal merit. He died 1488, aged 56.

VERSCHURING, Henry, a native of Gorcum, who studied painting under John Bols of Utrecht, and afterwards in the Italian schools. He followed the Dutch army in 1672, and drew views of its various encampments, &c. He was made public magistrate at Docum, but did not abandon his profession. He was drowned in a storm on the coast near Dordrecht 1690, aged 63.

VERSE', Noel Aubert de, a native of Mans, who embraced the Calvinistic doctrines and afterwards became a Roman Catholic. He was rewarded with a pension by the French clergy for his theological works. He died 1714.

VERSKOVIS, James Francis, a Flemish artist, who settled in England and died there 1749. His vases and figures in wood, ivory, &c. were much admired. His son was eminent as a painter.

VERSTEGAN, Richard, a native of London. His parents were of Flemish descent, and after studying at Oxford he went to settle at Antwerp, where he died 1625. He wrote a restitution of decayed intelligence in antiquities concerning the noble and renowned English nation, 4to. a curious work reprinted London 1634, and again 1674, 4to. — The Regal Government of England, — Antiquitates Belgicæ, 12mo. — Theatrum Crudelitatum Hæreticorum, 4to. &c.

VERT, Dom Claude de, an ecclesiastic of the order of Cluni. He studied at Avignon, and travelled into Italy, and devoted himself to enquiries on the ecclesiastical ceremonies of Rome. He died at Abbeville 1st May 1708, aged 63. He wrote a simple and historical history of the Ceremonies of the Church, 4 vols. 8vo. &c.

VERTOT D'AUBOEUF, René Aubert de, a native of Bennetot in Normandy. He entered among the Capucins, but quitted the order in 1677, to be admitted among the regular canons of Premontre. In 1701 he abandoned the solitude of the monastery for an ecclesiastical life, and a residence in Paris, where he found great and powerful patrons. He became in 1715, historiographer to the order of Malta, and was selected for the office of sub-preceptor to Lewis XV. but the appointment never took place. The abbé suffered much from the infirmities of age, and died 15th June, 1735, aged 80. In his character he was an amiable man, and united the virtues of private life to great intelligence, deep penetration, and an elegant taste. He wrote the History of the Revolutions of Portugal, 12mo. — History of the Revolutions of Sweden, 2 vols. 12mo. — History of the Revolutions of Rome, 3 vols. 12mo. his chief work — History of Malta, 4 vols. 4to. and 7, in 12mo. — History of the Settlement of the Britons in Gaul, 2 vols. 12mo. — Origin of the greatness of the Court of Rome, 12mo. — Dissertations on the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, &c.

VERTUE, George, a native of London, bound apprentice to an engraver of arms. He afterwards studied painting and engraving, and by degrees emerged into reputation and consequence by the patronage of Sir Godfrey Kneller and Lord Somers. He made a collection of materials for an history of painting and painters, which was bought of his widow and digested and published from his MSS. by Horace Walpole, in 4 vols. 4to. 1762, and afterwards republished 5 vols. 8vo. 1782. He died 1757, aged 73.

VERUS, Lucius Ceionius Commodus, son of Ælius, distinguished himself against the barbarians in the East, and was adopted by Marcus Aurelius, and admitted to share the throne. He died of an apoplexy in his German expedition, aged 39.

VERWEY, John, a learned Dutchman, who presided with great reputation over the school of Goude, and afterwards that of the Hague, where he died about 1690. He is author of a Medulla Aristarchi Vossiani — and Nova Via decendi Græce, 8vo. two grammars of singular merit and general utility.

VESALIUS, Andrew, a celebrated anatomist, born at Brussels of a family long distinguished for their knowledge of medicine. After studying at Louvain, where he displayed the strong bent of his genius by dissecting dogs, cats, moles, &c. he came to Paris and applied himself laboriously to anatomy, a science then in its infancy. He next visited Pisa, Bologna, and the other universities of Italy, and in 1537, was appointed anatomical professor at Padua. He next removed to Spain to be physician to Charles V. and there acquired the most extensive reputation by his skill and sagacity. From this high popularity he, however, all at once formed the project of going to the Holy Land, and while some attribute it to the wish of flying from the jealousy and persecution of his enemies at court, or to the troublesome peevishness of his wife, others ascribe the cause to a more extraordinary circumstance. He obtained, it is said, permission to open the body of a young nobleman, whom during a severe illness he had attended, but dreadful to relate, he no sooner uncovered the heart of his patient, than he perceived it still palpitating with life. This circumstance so irritated the weeping family of the nobleman, that the unhappy physician was summoned before the inquisition, but Charles V. interfered and saved him from the most excruciating torments, on condition that he should undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On his return from Cyprus and Jerusalem, which was hastened by the invitations of the senate of Venice, who solicited him to fill the medical chair of Padua, vacant by the death of Fallopius, the wretched pilgrim was shipwrecked and thrown upon the barren shores of the island of Zante, where he soon after perished through famine and hardship, Oct. 1674, aged about 60. His body when found was buried in St. Mary's church in the island. The chief of his works is, de Humani Corporis Fabrica, Leyden, 2 vols. fol. 1722. Vesalius may be truly considered as the great restorer of anatomy in Europe, as before his time it was not only neglected, but the study of it was impeded by the gross superstition and the ignorant prejudices of the age.

VESPASIAN, Titus Flavius, an obscure native of Riti, who by his merits and virtues rose to consequence in the Roman armies, and headed the expedition against Jerusalem. On the death of Vitellius A. D. 69, he was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers, and the wisdom, moderation, and firmness of his reign showed the propriety of the choice. This truly virtuous monarch, the liberal patron of learning, and the friend of morality and order, died A. D. 79, aged 71.

VESPUTIUS AMERICUS, the discoverer of the new continent, was a native of Florence. Vid. AMERICUS.

UGHELLI, Ferdinand, a native of Florence, who entered among the Cistercians, and distinguished himself by his learning, his humility, and his other virtues. He died at Rome 19th May, 1670, aged 75. He published Italia Sacra, 9 vols. fol. 1662, and 10 vols. fol. 1722.

VICARS, John, a native of London, educated at Christ's hospital and Queen's college, Oxford, after which he officiated as undermaster in Christ's hospital. He was author of God in the Mount, or England's Remembrancer, a poem, 4to. — Looking Glass for Malignants, and other pamphlets in favor of the presbyterians against the royalists. He died 1652.

VICARY, Thomas, a native of London, serjeant surgeon to Henry VIII. and his three successors, and surgeon to St. Bartholomew's hospital, was the first anatomical writer in the English language. His book, "a Treasure for Englishmen, or the Anatomy of a Man's Body," 12mo. 1577, and other medical and surgical tracts are chiefly compiled from the works of Galen and of the Arabians.

VICENTE, Giles, a famous dramatic poet of Lisbon in the 16th century, whose works have served as models to the labors of Lopez de Vega, and to Quevedo. He wrote with great facility, and his pieces were so popular among the Portuguese, that he was called the Plautus of Portugal. It is said, that Erasmus learned the Portuguese to be able to read his works, which were published by his children in five parts, 1562.

VICO, John Baptist, a native of Naples, who became professor of rhetoric in the university there. The best known of his works is Scienza Nuova. He died 1740, aged 70.

VICO D'AZIR, Felix, a native of Valone, who like his father became eminent as a physician. He came to Paris in 1765, and acquired such celebrity that in 1775 he was sent by the minister Turgot to stop a contagious distemper which raged among the people of Languedoc, and in this he was happily successful. He was one of the founders of the society of medicine, and pronounced the eulogies of Haller, Linné, Pringle, and other illustrious men, and with such applause, that he was elected member of the academy of sciences in the room of Buffon. He died universally respected, 20th June, 1794, aged 46. Besides his eulogies he wrote memoirs — Anatomical Observations — Description of the Nerves, &c.

VICTOR I. pope after Eleutherus 193, suffered martyrdom under Severus 202. During his age there were violent disputes in the church about the time most proper for the celebration of Easter.

VICTOR II. Gebehard, elected pope after Leo IX. 1055, died two years after. He was an active pontiff, who devoted himself attentively to the reformation of his clergy.

VICTOR, III. Didier, was elected pope 1086. He hurled a bull of excommunication against the anti-pope Guibert, and died soon after 16th Sept. 1087. Some of his epistles, dialogues, &c. are extant. There was an anti-pope of that name after the death of Anicletus, 1138.

VICTOR, Amadeus, duke of Savoy, and first king of Sardinia, was born 14th May 1666, and succeeded his father Charles Emanuel in 1675. By his marriage with the niece of Lewis XIV. he ensured the co-operation of France, but he was no sooner established in his power, than he declared against his new allies. He was consequently attacked and defeated by Catinat at Staffarde 1690, and lost all Savoy, but two years after he entered Dauphiné and seized upon Gap and Embrun. Another victory at Marseilles, obtained over him by Catinat, robbed him of all his newly acquired dominions, but though he was obliged to make peace in 1696, he took up arms again in 1701, encouraged by the promises of the emperor, who flattered his ambition by the hopes of possessing a large territory between the Po and Tanaro. His troops were now defeated by Vendôme, and Turin his capital besieged by the duke de la Feuillade, but the timely succour of prince Eugene saved him from ruin, and restored him to his independence. Peace was restored in 1713, and Victor, acknowledged king of Sicily by the king of Spain, soon after resigned his title in favor of the emperor, who in return supported his assumption of the name of king of Sardinia. Tired with the intrigues and labors of greatness, Victor at last in 1730, after a reign of 55 years, abdicated the throne in favor of his son, but the next year, with the same capricious inconsistency, he reclaimed the regal honors. The son might have complied, but when he saw that the crown was claimed by the suggestions of an ambitious mistress, who tyrannized over the affections of his father, he wisely refused, and the fickle old man soon after died at Rivoli near Turin, 31st Oct. 1732.

VICTORIUS, or VETTORIN, Peter, a learned Florentine, appointed by Cosmo de Medicis, professor of eloquence in the college of his native town. He was universally respected for his learning and abilities, and served his country in some embassies. He died 1585, aged 87. He is to be regarded as one of the first restorers of learning in Italy, and he ably devoted his time in elucidating the classics, especially Cicero. His works are Critical Notes on Cicero, Cato, Varro, and Columella mella — Commentaries on Aristotle's Rhetoric, &c. — Collection of Latin Epistles and Harangues, &c.

VICTORIUS, Benedict, a native of Faenza, professor of medicine at Bologna. He wrote Empyric Medicine, 8vo. — de Morbo Gallico, 8vo. — la Grande Pratique, 2 vols. fol. &c. and died about 1552, aged 72. His uncle Lionel was also professor of medicine at Bologna where he died 1530. He wrote a Treatise on the Diseases of Children, 8vo. — Practice of Medicine, 4to. &c.

VIDA, Mark Jerome, a celebrated modern poet, born at Cremona 1470. After finishing his studies at Padua and Bologna, he entered into the order of the regular canons of St. Mark at Mantua, which he soon after exchanged for the order of St. John Lateran at Rome. His poetical fame reached the ears of Leo X., who rewarded him with his friendship and the priory of St. Sylvester at Tivoli. In this charming retreat he devoted himself to the composition of his Christias, and though his labors were interrupted by the death of his patron, he soon emerged from the dissatisfaction which the neglect shown to literary merit during the short reign of Adrian VI. had created, and under the next pope, Clement VII., he received the rewards due to his talents, and was made bishop of Alba, 1532. This truly benevolent prelate, and learned man, died 27th Sept. 1566, aged 96, and was buried in his own cathedral; and his countrymen of Cremona honored his memory by the erection of a noble monument in their cathedral. The tributes of praise paid to the genius and merits of this great man, have been numerous, and among them, the words of Pope are particularly striking. Speaking of Leo's golden days, the poet thus celebrates his name:

With sweeter notes each rising temple rang,
A Raphael painted, and a Vida sang.
Immortal Vida! on whose honored brow,
The poet's bays, the critic's ivy grow,
Cremona now shall ever boast thy name,
As next in place to Mantua, next in fame.

The poetical works of Vida were collected by himself, 2 vols. 8vo. 1550. They consist of Ars Poetica, a valuable Poem — de Bombyce Libri Duo, the most correct of his works — Scaccia Ludus — Hymni de Rebus Divinis — Christiados Libri Sex — Bucolica, Eclogæ, & Carmina, &c. — Besides these he wrote Dialogi de Republicæ Dignitate — Orationes Tres adversus Papienses, &c. — Constitutiones Synodales Albæ, &c. The best edition of his poems is that of Oxford 1733, in 3 vols. 8vo.

VIETA, Francis, master of requests to queen Margaret, was born at Fontenay, in Poitou 1540, and acquired great celebrity as a mathematician. He was the first who used in algebra the letters of the alphabet to mark known quantities, as they could express every variety of number, and he also introduced some important improvements in that science, and in geometry. He made afterwards some alterations in the Gregorian calendar, and showed himself so exact and sagacious in deciphering the secrets of the Spanish government in their intercepted letters, that the divulging of the contents which were obscurely clothed in 500 different characters, was ascribed to magic. He died 1603.

He published Apollonius of Perga, under the name of Apollonius Gallus, 4to. 1610, and his works were collected together in 1646, in 1 vol. folio, by F. Schooten.

VIEWSSENS, Raymond de, a native of Rouergue, who became physician to the king of France, and distinguished himself by his publications on his profession, one of which, on Internal Diseases, in 4 vols. 4to. was published by his grandson 1774. He died at Montpellier, where he had retired for his health, 1715.

VIGAND, or WIGAND, John, a Lutheran divine, born at Mansfield. He was engaged in the publication of that important work, the Centuries of Magdeburgh, printed at Basil, 13 vols. fol. 1562, and afterwards prefixed over the churches of Pomerania. He wrote several works in favor of the reformation, and died 21st Oct. 1587, aged 64.

VIGILIUS, an African bishop, about 484. He ably opposed the heretics of his age in his sermons and in his writings, which have been published separately at Dijon, 4to. 1665.

VIGILIUS, a Roman, who was elevated to the papal throne by the intrigues of Theodora the wife of Justinian, to whom he promised as the price of his elevation, that he would cancel all the decrees of the council of Constantinople, against the Eutychian bishops whose cause she embraced. Though thus raised to the pontificate in 537, he afterwards ventured to oppose Theodora, and even excommunicated her, for which he was banished from Rome, but died soon after at Syracuse 555. Eighteen of his letters have been published at Paris, 8vo. 1642.

VIGNES, Peter des, a native of Capua, who rose from the obscurest situation to the dignity of chancellor of the German empire. After receiving his education at Bologna, by the charity of some benevolent persons he rose to consequence, and became the favorite of the emperor Frederic. It is said that he attempted to poison his master, for which his eyes were put out, but others attributed this severe treatment to the malice and misrepresentation of his enemies. Disgusted with the confinement of a prison and the tyrannical conduct of his sovereign, he dashed his head against the column to which his galling chains were fastened, and thus expired 1249. Des Vignes was very eminent in the knowledge of jurisprudence. Some of his works have been printed.

VIGNOLE, James Barozzio, an eminent architect, born at Vignole in the duchy of Modena, 1507. He studied at Rome, and was afterwards employed in France by Francis I. in the construction of several splendid edifices, after which he returned to Italy to finish the magnificent palace of cardinal Farnese. He died at Rome, 7th July 1573, aged 66. He wrote a treatise on the Five Orders of Architecture in Italian, translated into French by Davilier, 3 vols. 4to. — and, another, sur la Perspective Pratique.

VIGNOLES, Stephen de, better known by the name of la Hire, was of an illustrious family, settled at Languedoc. He was one of the ablest generals in the service of Charles VII. and he obliged the duke of Bedford to raise the siege of Montargis, and assisted Joan of Arc in the relief of Orleans. After contributing by his valor to the restoration of Charles to his throne, he died at Montauban, 1447.

VIGNOLES, Alphonso de, a native of Aubais in Languedoc, who, as a Calvinist, left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Prussia. He was patronized by the king of Prussia, and made director of the royal academy of sciences at Berlin, where he died 24th July 1744, aged 95. He wrote the Chronology of the Holy Scriptures, &c. 2 vols. 4to. — Epistola Chronologica — Conjectures on Virgil's fourth Eclogue, &c.

VILLALFANDUS, John Baptist, a jesuit of Corduba, well skilled in the knowledge of the holy scriptures. He wrote Desultory Commentaries on Ezekiel, in 3 vols. 1596, in which he gives an interesting description of the Temple and city of Jerusalem. He wrote besides, Explanatio Epistolarum S. Pauli, &c. and died 22d May, 1608.

VILLARET, Claude, a native of Paris, who first became known by his romance of la Belle Allemande. In consequence of some domestic distresses he quitted Paris, and to support himself began the life of an actor at Rouen, Compiègne, Liege, &c. but he afterwards abandoned a profession in which he had acquired some celebrity. He again settled at Paris, and obtained the place of first commissary of the chamber of accounts. On the death of Velly he was appointed his successor in the completion of an History of France, which he ably continued from the 8th volume, and the reign of Philip VI. to the 348th page of the 17th volume. He wrote besides, Considerations sur l'Art du Theatre, 8vo. — & l'Esprit de Voltaire. He died at Paris, March 1766, aged 61.

VILLARS, Andrew de Brancas de, a French general, who espoused the interests of the league against Henry IV. He was afterwards gained over by the interference of Sully, and when taken prisoner at the battle of Dourlens by the Spaniards, 24th July, 1595, he was basely murdered by the conquerors.

VILLARS, Louis Hector, marquis and duke of, peer of France, was born at Moulins in Bourbonnois, 1653. He embraced early the profession of arms, and distinguished himself on the Rhine, at the siege of Maestricht, at the battle of Senef, and on various occasions, and for his services was raised to the rank of marshal of France, 1690. At the peace of Ryfwick, he went ambassador to Vienna, and when afterwards placed at the head of the French armies, he defeated the prince of Baden, and gained the battle of Hochstet; but after supporting the character of a brave and active general against the superior genius of Marlborough, he was at last routed and dangerously wounded at the battle of Malplaquet, 1709. He afterwards regained his reputation at Denay on the Scheld, and by the fall of Douay, Quesnoy, and other places, and he assisted in the establishment of peace as plenipotentiary at Radstadt, 1714. After the death of Lewis XIV. he supported the administration of the duke of Orleans, and in 1733, when a new war broke out, he was sent to take the command of the French armies in Italy. He took Pifighione, but soon after was taken ill, and died at Turin, 17th June 1734, aged 82. His memoirs were published in Holland, 3 vols. 12mo.

VILLEFORE, Joseph Francis Bourgoïn de, a native of Paris, who devoted himself laboriously to literary pursuits, and published various works on history, &c. He died 2d Sept. 1737, aged 85.

VILLENA, marquis of, a Spanish poet, allied to the royal house of Arragon. He preferred retirement and solitude to the intrigues of the court, and translated, at the request of his relation John, king of Navarre, Virgil's Æneid into Spanish verse. His Gaya Ciencia, a system of poetry, rhetoric, and oratory, describing the ceremonies and public exhibitions of the Troubadours, is his most celebrated performance. He also translated Dante into prose, a work still esteemed by the Spaniards, and died of the gout, 1434.

VILLENEUVE, Gabrielle Susanne Barbot de, widow of John Baptist de Gaalon de V. lieutenant-colonel of French infantry, is distinguished as an elegant and interesting novel writer. Her romances are numerous, the best known of which are, la Jeune Americaine, 12mo. — le Phenix Conjugal — le Juge Prevenu — la Jardiniere de Vincennes, &c. She died 29th Dec. 1755.

VILLETTE, Charles marquis de, a native of Paris, known as a writer. He married Voltaire's niece, and was one of the members of the convention. He died 10th July, 1793, and his remains were attended to the grave by a deputation of the French senators. His eulogies of Charles V. Henry IV. — poetical pieces, &c. were collected together 1784, 8vo.

VILLIERS, George, duke of Buckingham, was born of a respectable family at Brookeby, Leicestershire, 20th Aug. 1592, and after receiving an indifferent education, he travelled into France, where he acquired all the personal accomplishments of the gentleman and the courtier. He was introduced to the notice of James I. at the play represented for his entertainment by the students of Cambridge, and the monarch was so captivated with his handsome person and his fine clothes, that he soon succeeded to the honors of the discarded Somerset, and became cup-bearer to the king. By degrees honors were heaped upon him; he was knighted, and rapidly rose to the rank of a baron, an earl, a marquis, and a duke, and was made master of the horse, warden of the cinque ports, and obtained the disposal of all the offices of honor and emolument, in the church and state in the three kingdoms. In 1620 he married the earl of Rutland's daughter, the richest heiress in the kingdom, and three years after he persuaded the prince of Wales to go to Spain, in disguise, to solicit the hand of the Infanta his intended bride. On the death of James, Villiers retained all his influence with the new monarch, but while he was the favorite of the court, he was regarded with odium by the parliament and the people. His unpopularity was increased by rashly advising his master to dissolve the parliament and to raise supplies without the consent of the people. In the midst of these popular discontents a war broke out with France, and the duke took upon himself to carry hostilities into the enemy's country, but instead of landing on the continent he made an imprudent attack on the isle of Rhé, in which he lost the flower of his army. This disaster was to be repaired by a more formidable armament, for the relief of Rochelle, which Richelieu was besieging with all the powers of the French monarchy, and the duke made the most extraordinary preparations for the expedition, but before he sailed he was stabbed at Portsmouth by Felton a lieutenant of the army, who was dissatisfied with his conduct, and had vowed his death. This happened 23d Aug. 1628, in the 36th year of his age. In his disposition Buckingham was generous and humane, but in his attachments he was violent and headstrong. Immoderately ambitious, he viewed the cautious measures of the parliament with distrust and contempt, and to carry into execution his favorite measures, he hesitated not to sacrifice the interests of his master, and the happiness of the people. For the information which he possessed on public affairs he was indebted to the partiality of the monarch, who with ridiculous fondness for his person resolved to make him a master-piece, and to mould him as it were platonically to his own ideas.

VILLIERS, George, duke of Buckingham, son of the preceding, was born at Wallingford house, London, 30th Jan. 1627, the year before his father's murder. After being at Cambridge he went on his travels, and at his return he was presented to the king who was at Oxford, and he entered at Christ church. On the fall of the royal power he went with prince Charles to Scotland, and shared afterwards his dangers at the battle of Worcester, but after accompanying him on the continent he returned to England and retrieved his fortunes by marrying, in 1657, the daughter of lord Fairfax. Though thus connected with republicans, he did not lose the royal favor, but preserving his property, he at the restoration was possessed of an estate of 20,000l. a year, and added to his honors the place of master of horse to the king. The favors which he enjoyed at court were, however, soon forfeited when he joined a conspiracy against the government, yet so forgiving was the king's temper, that he was restored, on his submission, to his honors and to confidence. The flagitious attempt which he made with Blood on the duke of Ormond's life, did not again expose him, as he deserved, to the royal displeasure, but he was made chancellor of Cambridge, and employed as ambassador to Lewis XIV. He afterwards resigned the chancellorship, and capriciously favored the cause of the nonconformists, and afterwards was sent to the Tower for contempt by order of the house of lords. He died at Kirkby Moorside, Yorkshire, 16th April, 1688, after a short illness of three days, of an ague, in consequence of sitting on the ground when fatigued with hunting. His remains were buried in Westminster abbey. Though a man of abilities, of great vivacity, and of quickness of parts, he did not possess a single virtue. His wit was malevolence, his generosity was profuseness, and so debauched was his character that the whole business of life seemed to be the gratification of the most sensual appetites. His character has been well delineated under the name of Zimri in Dryden's Abraham and Achitophel, but though a debauchee he has acquired celebrity as a poet and a man of letters. His poems though few in number are great in merit. Besides the Rehearsal, a comedy of singular merit, in which he ridicules the dramatic writers of his age, he wrote the Chances, altered from Fletcher — the Restoration — the Battle of Sedgemoor — the Militant Couple — an Essay on Reason and Religion — on Human Reason — Discourse on the Reasonableness of having a Religion and Worship of God, &c.

VILLOTTE, James, a jesuit of Bar-le-duc, who travelled into Armenia, and returned to Europe 1709. He died at St. Nicholas near Nancy, 14th June, 1743, aged 87. He wrote Explanation of the Catholic Faith — Christian Armenia, &c. — Commentaries on the Gospels, 4to. — Armenian Dictionary, &c.

VINCENT, Thomas, author of God's Terrible Voice in the City, by Plague, and Fire, 8vo. — of an Explanation of the Catechism, and other religious tracts, was ejected for nonconformity from the living of St. Mary Magdalen in Milk-street, and died at Hoxton 1671. During the plague he continued in the city, and by his discourses from the pulpit greatly contributed to support the spirits, and relieve the terrors of the afflicted inhabitants.

VINCENT, Nathaniel, author of the Conversion of a Sinner, and the Day of Grace, 8vo. sermons, and other religious books, was of Magdalen college, Oxford, and was ejected from the living of Langley Marsh, Bucks, for nonconformity. He adhered so strenuously to his dissenting principles that he was imprisoned for preaching in a conventicle at Southwark. He died 1697.

VINCI, Leonard, a celebrated painter, descended of a noble family, and born in the castle of Vinci near Florence 1445. He studied under Verrochio, and soon became a most accomplished painter, well skilled in the knowledge of anatomy, of optics, of geometry, and of all the arts which could add correctness, grace, and delicacy to the efforts of a great genius. He was patronized by Lewis Sforza, duke of Milan, and not only introduced the simplicity and purity of the Greeks over the rude Gothic, but he contributed much to ornament the city, and as well acquainted with architecture and engineering, he supplied it with water by a new canal 200 miles in length. The wars of Milan, and the misfortunes and captivity of the duke influenced the destinies of the painter, and Leonard quitted a city which he had adorned with his paintings and the labors of his genius. He removed to Florence where he found protection and friendship with the Medicis. From Florence he went to Rome, and soon after visited France by the liberal invitations of Francis I. The fatigues of the journey, however, were too much for his constitution, he languished for some months at Fontainebleau, and during one of the visits which he frequently received from Francis, he raised himself in his bed to show the gratitude of his heart, and at that moment being seized with a fainting fit, he expired in the arms of the monarch, who had eagerly stooped to support him. This was in 1520. The best of his pieces was our Saviour's last supper, painted in oil, on the wall of a church of Milan, long since defaced from moisture and the ravages of time, though a copy of it was taken by order of Francis I., which is preserved at St.

Germain's. At Florence he was engaged with Michael Angelo in painting the council chamber of the city, but this union of talents produced unfortunately not only rivalry, but lasting jealousy. According to Rubens, his chief excellence was in giving every thing its proper character. His pieces are mostly preserved at Florence and in France. He wrote treatises on the Nature, Equilibrium, and Motion of Water, — on Anatomy, — on Perspective, — on Light and Shadows, — on Painting, &c.

VINER, sir Robert, a goldsmith and banker of London, who was much noticed by Charles II., to whom he lent large sums of money. When he was lord mayor of the city the monarch honored him with his presence at dinner, and showed him many marks of kindness and favor.

VINES, Richard, an English divine born at Blaston, Leicestershire. He was educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Hinckley school, and when in orders he obtained the living of Weddington, Warwickshire. The civil wars drove him from his parish to Coventry, but on the establishment of the presbyterian government in 1644, he was nominated one of the assembly of divines, and proved himself by his eloquence, an able champion of the republican cause. From London, where he obtained St. Clement Danes, and St. Lawrence Jewry, he removed to Cambridge, where he was appointed master of Pembroke hall, which he resigned soon after, as he would not take the engagement. In the conferences which he had with the monarch as one of the deputies from the parliament, he conducted himself with becoming propriety and marked respect towards his unfortunate sovereign, and on the morning of his execution he offered him his spiritual consolation and assistance. He died 1655, and was buried in St. Lawrence Jewry, where his monument perished in the great fire of London. Though a strong and violent Calvinist, he was a benevolent man, void of pride and flattery, and as a scholar distinguished for his perfect knowledge of Greek, and eminent as a philologist, invincible as a disputant, and as a preacher most persuasive. He often preached before the parliament, and of the sermons which he composed, 32 have been published.

VINNIUS, Arnold, professor of law at Leyden, was author of commentaries on the institutes of Justinian, 2 vols. 4to. and on the ancient lawyers, 8vo. and died at Leyden 1657, aged 69.

VIOT, Marie Ann Henrietta Payan de l'Esclapart, a native of Dresden, distinguished for her learning, her wit, and the great versatility of her genius. She married d'Antremont at the age of 12, and was a widow at 16, and afterwards she took for her second husband de Bourdic of Nîmes. Her mental accomplishments recommended her to the notice of the learned, she was honored with a seat in the academy of Nîmes, and read on her admission an eulogy on her favorite author Montaigne. Among her compositions are known an Ode to Silence, — the Summer — Fauvette, a romance, — la Foret de Brama, an opera — Epistle to Tremblay, &c. This ingenious and excellent woman died of a fever in the summer of 1802, aged 56, at Bagnols.

VIRGILIUS, Publius Maro, a celebrated Latin poet.

He was born at Andes near Mantua, and died at Brundisium, B. C. 19, aged 51. He was happily patronized by Mæcenas and Augustus, and the independence which he enjoyed permitted him to devote the great powers of his genius to the composition of the sublimest efforts of the Italian muse. His 10 Eclogues, his four Georgics, and his Æneid in 12 books are well known, and will be read and admired so long as the labors of genius can command the applauses of mankind.

VIRGINIA, daughter of Virginius, was stabbed to the heart by her father, and thus saved from the violence which Appius the tyrannical decemvir meditated against her person, under the pretence that she was the slave of one of his freed men. This created a revolution in the state, and the abolition of the decemviral power, 449 B. C.

VITELLIO or VITELLO, a native of Poland, author of a treatise on Optics, collected from the works of Euclid, Archimedes, and others, in the middle of the 13th century. His works were best edited in 1572.

VITELLIUS, Aulus, a Roman emperor. After sharing in the debaucheries of Tiberius, and administering to the vices of Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, he was proclaimed emperor in Germany by his troops, in opposition to Otho. Though defeated in three battles by his rival he prevailed in the fourth, but instead of reigning like a father, he disgraced himself by every species of licentiousness, and at last was assassinated, and Vespasian placed on the throne A. D. 69.

VITRINGA, Campegio, a native of Leewarde in Friesland, who became professor at the university of Franeker, where he died of an apoplexy 3d March 1722, aged 63. He was author of a Latin commentary on Isaiah 2 vols. fol. — Apocalypsis Anachrisis, 4to. — Typus Theologiæ Practicæ 8vo. — Synagoga Vetus, 4to. — Archisynagogus, 4to. — De decem Viris Otiosæ Synagogæ, 4to. — Observationes Sacræ, 4to. — His son of the same name died also at Franeker 1723, aged 31, professor of theology and author of a valuable abridgment of Natural Theology, 4to. 1720.

VITRUVIUS, M. Pollio, a famous architect of antiquity. He lived in the age of Julius Cæsar, and dedicated his valuable work on architecture, in 10 books, to Augustus Cæsar; but few particulars are known of his history. The best edition of this work is that of Amsterdam, 1649 in fol.

VIVALDI, Antonio, a famous Italian musician. His execution on the violin was particularly admired, and his symphonies, and four seasons, are still popular pieces. He died about 1743, at Venice.

VIVARES, Francis, an engraver of great eminence, born at St. John de Bruel, a village of Rouergue. He came to London in 1727 with the intention of following the business of his uncle, a master tailor, but his partiality to engraving prevailed, and by the instructions of Amiconi the Italian painter, he acquired an extensive reputation. His landscapes, and trees were particularly admired. He died 1780, aged 71. He was three times married, and by his first wife, had 16 children, and by the two last 15.

VIVENS, Francis de, a French physician, who died at Clairac 1780, aged 80. He was author of tracts on the the Flight of Birds, — on the Principles of Physics — new Theory of Motion, &c.

VIVES, John Lewis, a native of Valencia, in Spain, who taught belles lettres at Louvain, and came to England, where he taught Latin to Mary the daughter of Henry VIII. He was highly favored by the monarch, but when he presumed to speak and to write against the divorce of Catherine of Arragon, he was arrested, and for six months sent to prison. When he recovered his liberty he returned to Spain, and died at Bruges 6th May, 1540, aged 48. He wrote Commentaries on Augustin's Civitas Dei — a treatise on the Corruption, and Decline of Arts and Sciences — treatise on Religion — and other theological works.

VIVIANI, Vincent, a famous mathematician, born at Florence, 5th April 1622. He was the pupil and the friend of Galileo, and acquired such reputation that he received a pension from Lewis XIV., and was appointed first mathematician to the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 22d Sep. 1703, member of several learned societies in Europe. He published Divination on Aristeas, a work of merit, fol. — de Maximis & Minimis Geometricæ Divinatio in Quintum Conicor. Apoll. Pergæi, &c. fol. — Enodatio Problematum Universis Geometris Propositorum, a Cl. Commieres, 4to. — a treatise on Proportions, 4to.

VIVIEN, Joseph, a painter born at Lyons. He studied under le Brune, and was patronized by the electors of Cologne and Bavaria. His pieces are much admired for correctness of delineation, and a happy manner which gave to the features the very feelings of the soul. He died at Bonn in Germany 1735, aged 78.

ULACQ, Adrian, author of a treatise on Trigonometry in Latin, fol. — Logarithmorum Chiliades Centum, fol. 1628, was a native of Ghent, and died in the middle of the 17th century.

ULFELD CORNIFIX, count de, son of the Danish minister, was patronized by Christian IV. king of Denmark, whose natural daughter he married. His ambition, and his intrigues rendered him suspected to the next monarch Frederic III. and he fled to Sweden, where Christina received him with open arms. After that queen's death he returned to Copenhagen, but his intentions were interpreted as hostile to the government, and he was again obliged to fly for protection abroad. He lived for some time in disguise at Basil, but being discovered, he sailed down the Rhine, and died of cold in the vessel in which he had embarked, Feb. 1664, aged 60, and was buried at the foot of a neighbouring tree.

ULLOAY PEREIRA, Lewis de, a Spanish poet, born at Toro, in Leon. He gained the protection of Philip IV. by his sonnets, and other poetical pieces, and by the friendship of the duke of Olivares, he obtained the government of the province of Leon. He died 1660. Though great in the comic and the burlesque, he was equally successful in the grave and the serious. The best of his poems is Rachel, or the Loves of Alphonso VIII. His works were printed together, 1674, in 4to.

ULLOA, Dom Antonio, a Spanish mathematician, sent with others to Peru, to measure a degree of the meridian. On his return to Europe, he was taken by the English, and when released was again sent to America, as governor of Louisiana. He died 1795, aged 79. His Historical Voyages in South America, have appeared 2 vols. 4to. and have been translated into French.

VLODOMIR, grand duke of Russia, embraced Christianity in 989, and enforced the observation of its mild tenets among his heathen subjects. His good intentions were powerfully seconded by his daughter-in-law, the daughter of Boleslaus, duke of Poland, who brought in her retinue Reimbern, bishop of Colberg, an active and intelligent missionary. Vlodimir, by an old age of repentance, made amends for the cruelties and the debauchery of his former years, and after his death he was regarded by his subjects as an apostle and a saint, and his tomb at Kiow has long continued an object of veneration among the Russians. An order of merit was established by the second Catherine, which bears his name.

ULPIAN, Domitius, an eminent lawyer, minister of state to the emperor Alexander Severus. He was very hostile to the Christians. He was assassinated by the soldiers, 226. Some fragments of his works are extant.

ULRICA, Eleonora, second daughter of Charles XI. of Sweden, was born 1688, governed the kingdom during the absence of her brother Charles XII. and after his death she was proclaimed queen, 1719. The following year she resigned the crown to her husband Frederic of Hesse-Cassel, with whom she shared the honors of royalty; but such was the ascendancy of the nobles, that they obliged their sovereigns to acknowledge their right to the throne as the unbiassed election of the people. Ulrica, by a wise administration, contributed to restore peace and prosperity to the nation, and died much respected, 1741. The wife of Charles XI. of Sweden, and the mother of the preceding, also bore the name of Ulrica, and died 1693, in consequence of the chagrin which her husband's treatment had occasioned. When she supplicated his compassion in favor of those whom his government oppressed, he spurned her from him, observing, "that he had taken her to give him children, not advice."

ULUG-BEIG, a Persian prince, celebrated for his knowledge of astronomy. His catalogue of fixed stars, rectified for 1434, was published by Thomas Hyde at Oxford in 1665 in 4to. with learned and useful notes. This worthy prince was put to death by his own son 1449, after reigning 40 years at Samarcand. Another learned work on Chronology, in Arabic, has been attributed to him, and it has been edited in the original, with a Latin translation by John Greaves, London 1650, in 4to.

VOETIUS, Gisbert, a learned divine, born at Heusden 3d March 1589. He was appointed in 1634, professor of theology, and of oriental languages at Utrecht, where he continued an active instructor for 40 years, and died 1st Nov. 1677, aged 87. His accusation of Descartes whom he charged with atheism, was believed by the magistrates of Utrecht, and the two Apologetical letters of the philosopher were condemned to to

to ignominy. His followers were called Voetians. He published Exercitia & Bibliotheca Studioſi Theologi — Politica Eccleſiaſtica, 4 vols. 4to. — Diatribæ de Cæſo Beatorum, &c. — His ſon Paul was profeſſor of law at Utrecht, and died 1667, aged 48. He wrote de Uſu Juris Civilis & Canonici, &c. — de Jure Militari — Commentar. in Inſtitutiones Imperiales, 2 vols. 4to. — de Mobilium & Immobil. Naturâ, 8vo. — John, the ſon of Paul, was profeſſor of law at Leyden, and at Herborn, and died 1714, author of an excellent Commentary on the Pandects, 2 vols. folio, 1698-1704, &c.

VOGLERUS, Valentine Henry; a native of Helmſtadt, who became profeſſor of medicine, and died there, highly reſpected as a phyſician, 1677, aged 55. He wrote an Account of Writers, &c. improved by Meibomius — Inſtitutionum Physiologicarum Liber, 4to. — Diatricorum Comment. Diſſertationes, &c.

VOIGT, Godfrey, a learned Lutheran divine, who was born at Miſnia, and died at Hamburgh, 1682. He wrote a treatiſe on the Altars of the Primitive Chriſtians, 8vo. &c.

VOISENON, Charles Henry de Fuſée de, a native of Voisenon, near Melun, who quitted the eccleſiaſtical profeſſion for the pleaſures of the world, and for the writing of dramatic pieces. He was author of various romances — fugitive pieces of poetry — ſeveral comedies — lyric poems — hiſtorical fragments, &c. written in an eaſy and pleaſing ſtyle, and collected together in 5 vols. 8vo. 1782, by Madame de Turpin. He died 22d Nov. 1775, aged 67.

VOISIN, Joſeph de, a native of Bourdeaux, who became counſellor in the parliament of his native town, and afterwards entered into orders. He wrote Theology of the Jews, in Latin, 4to. — treatiſe on the Divine Law, 8vo. — and other treatiſes, and died 1685.

VOISIN, Daniel Francis, counſellor of the parliament of Paris, roſe by his merits to the higheſt offices of the ſtate, and in 1714 was made chancellor of France. His integrity and virtues were eminently diſplayed in a conference with Lewis XIV. The monarch, who had promiſed pardon to ſome worthleſs culprit, directed his chancellor to affix the ſeals to the pardon, and when the upright magiſtrate reſuſed, he took the ſeals, and ſealed the pardon himſelf. When Lewis deſired his miniſter to take the ſeals back, he declined it, ſaying, “they are contaminated, I wiſh no longer to hold them.” Aſtoniſhed at his firmneſs, the king, with an exclamation of admiration, threw the pardon into the fire; “now,” rejoined the chancellor, “I can properly reſume the ſeals, as fire purifies every thing.” This excellent character died ſuddenly, 1ſt Feb. 1718, aged 62.

VOITURE, Vincent, an eminent French writer, ſon of a wine-merchant, born at Amiens, 1598. His wit and literary reputation ſoon recommended him to the notice of the court, where he was liberally patronized and penſioned. He was ſent to Spain on political affairs, and during his ſtay at Madrid, he wrote verſes in Spaniſh with ſuch elegance that they were aſcribed to the muſe of Lope de Vega. He afterwards viſited

Rome, where he was courteouſly treated, and he was the bearer of the information of the birth of Lewis XIV. to the court of Florence. Though loaded with penſions, he was, in conſequence of his fondneſs for gaming, always poor. He died 27th May, 1648. Though he wrote verſes with elegance in French, Spaniſh, and Italian, yet few of his poetical pieces are preſerved. His letters form nearly the whole of his works, and they have often been printed in 2 vols. 12mo. They are elegant, polite, and eaſy, and have deſerved the higheſt commendations of Boileau, who regards him not only as a poliſher and refiner of the French language in a barbarous age, but as a ſenſible and graceful writer. Voltaire, however, ſpeaks differently of his merits, and deſcribes his letters as the mere paſſtime of a wanton imagination, with nothing inſtructive, nothing flowing from the heart, but rather an abuſe than an exerciſe of wit.

VOLDER, Burchel de, a native of Amſterdam, profeſſor of philoſophy and mathematics at Leyden, where he died 1709, aged 66. He wrote Harangues and Diſſertations on Philoſophical Subjects.

VOLKOF, Feodor, the Garrick of Ruſſia, was the ſon of a tradeſman at Yaroffſk, and was born 1729. He was educated at Moſcow, but inſtead of devoting himſelf to the buſineſs of a manufacturer of ſalt-petre and ſulphur in the houſe of his mother's ſecond huſband, he took pleaſure in frequenting the German theatre at Petersburgh, and on his return to Yaroffſk, he erected a ſtage in his father's houſe, and provided himſelf with all the apparatus neceſſary for dramatic representation. His four brothers ſhared his theatrical labors, and by degrees acquired ſuch reputation, that a regular theatre was built for the reception of crowded audiences. The fame of the young performer was no ſooner reported at Petersburgh, than the emperſs in 1752 ſent for him to the capital, and nobly allowed him a handſome penſion, and enabled him to repreſent with effect and magnificence the fineſt productions of Sumorokof and of Moliere. Under the patronage of the court, not leſs than 2200l. were annually granted for the ſalaries of the actors, and Volkof and his brother were ennobled, and preſented with extenſive eſtates. The laſt character which this eminent actor performed was in the tragedy of Zemira, at Moſcow, and he died ſoon after, 1763, aged 35.

VOLMAR, Iſaac, a German ſtateſman, who aſſiſted as ambalaſſador from the emperor at the conferences before the peace of Weſtphalia. He wrote in Latin, Memoirs of the Tranſactions which happened at Munſter and Oſnaburgh between the Catholics and Proteſtants from 1643 to 1648. He died 1662.

VOLTAIRE, Marie Francis Arouet de, a French writer of great celebrity, born at Paris, 20th Feb. 1694. He was ſo feeble at his birth, that it was long doubtful whether he could be reared by the kindeſt attention of his parents. From his earlieſt years he evinced ſuperior powers of mind, and a ſprightly imagination, ſo that he ſaid, he wrote verſes before he left his cradle. He was educated in the college of Lewis the Great, where he made ſo aſtoniſhing a progreſs, that Ninon de l'Enclos left him 2000 livres to to buy him a library. He was intended for the law; but the muses had greater charms for him, and in the society of the courtiers of Lewis XIV. he acquired those graces of delicate humor and easy expression by which he was so much distinguished. His fondness for satire directed against the government, procured his imprisonment in the Bastille for one year, from which he was liberated by the interference of the duke of Orleans, who was pleased with the representation of Œdipus, the first tragedy which he wrote, 1718. Some of his plays were afterwards unsuccessful on the stage, and the poet, indignant at the severe censures of his countrymen, left Paris, and came to England, where he was much noticed by George I. and queen Caroline, under whose patronage he published his Henriade. Flattered with his reception from the English, and with the handsome property which he had realized by the liberality of his subscribers, he in 1728 returned to Paris, and while with avaricious eagerness he labored by commerce and by adventurous undertakings to improve his income, he devoted the best part of his time to literary pursuits. His Brutus, the most nervous of his tragedies, appeared in 1730, and was soon succeeded by Zara, the most pathetic of his dramatic pieces. His Lettres Philosophiques at this time gave such offence for their profane and indecent witticisms, that they were burnt by a decree of the parliament, and the author for a while withdrew from the public indignation to the seat of Madame de Chatelet on the borders of Lorraine. His Alzire, Mahomet, and Merope, produced soon after, placed him at the head of the dramatic poets of France, and introduced him to the court as the favorite of Madame Pompadour. He was appointed gentleman of the bed-chamber to the king, and historiographer of France, and in 1746 was gratified in the long coveted honor of a seat in the academy of sciences. Though thus in the possession of popularity, and universally admired for the bold effusions of his muse, he yet found a host of rivals and detractors, and to fly from their persecution, he retired to the court of Berlin. The confidence and familiarity of the Prussian monarch, and a liberal pension of 22,000 livres, for a while commanded his attachment and partiality; but a quarrel with Maupertuis, who was at the head of the Berlin academy, and that spirit of independence and inconstancy which always marked his conduct, soon after brought on his disgrace, and after being dispossessed of a volume of royal verses, which he wished to carry away, he was permitted to leave the kingdom. The publication of an obscene and impious poem at that time rendered his return to Paris dangerous, and, therefore, after staying one year at Colwar, he purchased an estate near Geneva, where he fixed his residence. This place he soon abandoned for Ferney, on the borders of France, where he established a little colony of industrious artisans, and received, in progress of time, the homage, and the respect of the learned of Europe. In this peaceful retreat, where he received the adulation of the great, and the liberal presents of crowned heads, especially of his ancient friend the king of Prussia, and of the empress Catherine, he continued long to direct the taste and the literature of the world. At last, in 1778, he ventured to exchange the tranquillity of Ferney for the incense of the capital, and, surrounded with glory and with wealth, he appeared at Paris, where he was received with unusual honors by all the learned bodies, and crowned with the poetic wreath, in the full theatre, amidst applauding thousands. These honors, and the complimentary visits of ceremony which they produced were, however, too burdensome for the great age of the poet, and change of regimen, and continued fatigue, inflamed his blood, and brought on a hæmorrhage. As if foreboding his approaching end, he declared, when he reached Paris, that he came to seek glory and death, and when presented by an artist with a picture of his triumph, he observed, "a tomb would be fitter for me than a triumph." When unable to enjoy his usual rest he took a large dose of opium, which deprived him of his senses, and he died soon after, 30th May, 1778. He was buried at Selieres, between Nogent and Troyes, and his remains were, during the fervor of the revolution, removed to the church of St. Genevieve, at Paris, by a decree of the convention. Voltaire was an extraordinary character; as the leader of a new sect he has caused a revolution in wit and morals, and whilst he has often exerted his powerful talents to promote the cause of reason and of humanity, to inspire princes with toleration, and with a horror for war, he has too often, and too successfully exerted himself in extending principles of irreligion, anarchy, and libertinism. Ever inconstant and wavering, he was the free-thinker at London, the Cartesian at Versailles, the christian at Nancy, and the infidel at Berlin. From the high character of the moralist, he frequently descended into the buffoon, from the philosopher he became an enthusiast, from mildness he passed to passion, from flattery to satire, from the love of money to the love of luxury, from the modesty of a wise man to the vanity of an impious wit, and from the faith of the humble christian to the foul language and effrontery of the blasphemous atheist. It has been said, that his physiognomy partook of that of the eagle and of the ape, and his character exhibited him occasionally with sensibility, but void of affection, voluptuous, but without passions, open without sincerity, and liberal without generosity. As a man of letters, he must stand on very high ground in the eye of posterity, for versatility of talents, for brilliancy of imagination, for astonishing ease, for exquisite taste, and for vast extent of knowledge. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote several tragedies, the last of which was Irene — several comedies, the best of which are, L'Indiscret, L'Enfant Prodigue, & Nanine — operas — fugitive pieces — Essai sur l'Histoire Generale — Les Siecles de Louis XIV. & Louis XV. — History of Charles XII. — of the Czar Peter — Melanges de Literature — Dictionnaire Philosophique — Philosophie de l'Histoire, and other works of impious tendency — Theatre of Peter and Th. Corneille, &c. These very voluminous works have appeared in various forms, and by several editors. The most correct edition is that of Geneva, in 30 vols. 4to. and the most copious, that of Basil, in 71 vols. 8vo.

VONDEL, Justus, or Josse du, a Dutch poet, born

17th Nov. 1587. His parents were anabaptists, but he quitted their sect for the Roman catholic tenets. With strong natural powers, he for a while disregarded the rules of art, and at the age of 30, began to learn Latin, to enjoy in their original, the beauties of the ancient muse. He wrote various poems, collected together in 9 vols. 4to. The best known of these are, the taking of Amsterdam by Florent V. count of Holland, a work of merit, though wild and irregular — the Destruction of Jerusalem, a tragedy — Palamedes, or Innocence Oppressed, a work which described the fate of Barneveldt, and for which the author was fined 300 livres by the influence of the offended Maurice — satires, bitterly severe against the ministers of the reformed religion, &c. He lived regardless of worldly affairs, and, consequently, died poor, 5th Feb. 1679, aged 91.

VOPISCUS, Flavius, a Syracusan in the reign of Diocletian, author of the Lives of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, &c. printed with the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores.

VORSTIUS, Conrad, a native of Cologne, who studied at Heidelberg, where he took his doctor's degree. He succeeded Arminius in the divinity chair at Leyden, 1611, an appointment which so displeased the Calvinists, that James I. not only caused his book De Deo to be burnt publicly in London, but prevailed upon the states of Holland, by entreaties and by threats, to banish the offending divine. This persecuted man at last found protection in Holstein, and died at Tonningen, 1622. His remains were conveyed to Fredericstadt, the newly built city of the Arminians, and buried with great pomp. His works are chiefly on controversial and theological subjects. His son William Henry was minister of the Arminians at Warmond, in Holland, and wrote several tracts, &c.

VORSTIUS, Elis Everard, a native of Ruremonde, professor of medicine at Leyden, where he died 1624, aged 59. He wrote, De Annulorum Origine — the Fishes of Holland — an Historical Voyage, &c. in Magna Græcia, &c. His son Adolphus was also professor of medicine at Leyden, and died 1663, aged 66. He published a Catalogue of the Plants in the Botanical Garden of Leyden.

VORTIGERN, a British chief, elected king after the departure of the Romans from the island, 445. To repel the invasion of the Picts and Scots, he called to his assistance the Saxons, and when these warlike tribes landed under the command of Hengist and Horsa, Vortigern granted them large domains. He afterwards married Rowena, Hengist's daughter, and granted him the kingdom of Kent, after which he retired to Wales, and was it is said burned in his castle about 484.

Vos, Martin de, a painter of Antwerp. He studied in Italy, and was intimate with Tintoret. His landscapes, historical pieces, &c. possessed singular merit. He died in his native town 1604, aged 70.

VOSSIUS, Gerard John, a learned writer, born near Heidelberg, 1577. He studied at Dort, and in 1595, removed to Leyden, and he acquired such reputation for learning and for merit, that though young, he was 1599 elected to the office of director of the college of Dort. He was in 1614 appointed director of the theological college of Leyden, and four years after was placed in the chair of eloquence and chronology. Though he endeavoured to avoid all controversy, he incurred the displeasure of the Gomarists in his history of Pelagianism, and was expelled from the communion of the Anti-remonstrants. Thus persecuted in Holland, he found friends and protection in England, and by the influence of Laud he obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, and was honored with the degree of doctor of laws at Oxford 1629. On the erection of the university of Amsterdam in 1630, Vossius was regarded as a most proper person to support by his learning and abilities the new establishment, and notwithstanding the clamors of his enemies and the opposition of Leyden against the institution, he was called to fill the chair of history. He died there 1649, aged 72. His works were published in 6 vols. fol. 1695. The best known of these are, Etymologicon Linguae Latinae — de Origine & Progressu Idololatriæ — de Historicis Græcis — de Hist. Latinis — de Arte Grammaticâ, &c. By his first wife, whom he married at Dort 1602, and who died 1607, he had three children, and by the second he had five sons and two daughters, of whom only one son survived him.

VOSSIUS, Francis, brother of the preceding, was author of a poem on a naval triumph obtained by Von Tromp, and died 1645.

VOSSIUS, Dionysius, son of Gerard John V. was celebrated for his learning, which it is said, in consequence of his intense application, hastened his death. He wrote valuable notes on the work of Moses Maimonides, with a Latin translation, and died 1633, at Amsterdam, aged 22.

VOSSIUS, Gerard, third son of Gerard John V. was an able critic, who edited, with valuable notes, Velleius Paterculus, 1639, in 16mo. and died 1640. His brother Matthew, wrote a valuable chronicle of Holland and Zealand in Latin, 4to. and died 1646.

VOSSIUS, Isaac, youngest of the children of Gerard John V. was born at Leyden 1618. He was educated under the care of his father, and acquired such celebrity that he was invited to Sweden to teach queen Christina the Greek language. He received in 1663, a handsome present from Lewis XIV. with a flattering letter from Colbert, and on his visit to England in 1670, he was courteously received by Charles II. made doctor of laws at Oxford, and appointed canon of Windsor, with apartments in the castle, where he died 10th Feb. 1688. The valuable library which he left was regarded as the best in the world, and it was purchased by the university of Leyden. Though learned and well informed, Vossius was weak and credulous, and though he wrote a book to prove the Septuagint to be the work of inspired writers, he ventured in private conversation to dispute the truths and reality of a revelation, in consequence of which, Charles well acquainted with his belief in fabulous stories exclaimed, "there is nothing which Vossius refuses to believe, except the bible." His works are very numerous, but may perhaps be regarded as less valuable than those of his father. The character of these two illustrious men has been drawn by the journalists nalists of Trevoux, with great accuracy. Nothing, say they, is more different than the make of their understandings. In the father judgment prevails, imagination in the son; the father labors slowly, the son goes on with ease; the father distrusts the best founded conjectures, the son loves nothing but conjectures; bold and daring, the father's aim was to instruct, the son's to parade and make a noise; truth was the father's object, and novelty the son's. In the father we admire vast erudition orderly arranged, and clearly expressed, in the son a dazzling turn of style, singular thoughts, and a vivacity which pleases even in a bad cause. The father was a man of probity and religion, and regular in his manners, the son was a libertine in principle and practice, he made religion the object of his insults, and only studied to find the weak sides of it, and as to his morality his obscene notes on Catullus will too fully prove the licentiousness of his heart.

Vossius, Gerard, a Roman catholic ecclesiastic, distantly related to the preceding. He died at Liege, where he was born 1609. He edited and enriched with Latin versions and with notes, the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Ephrem Syrus, and some of the pieces of J. Chrysostom and Theodoret, besides a commentary of Cicero's Somnium Scipionis.

Vouet, Simon, a celebrated painter, born at Paris 1582. After studying under his father who was a painter, he visited Constantinople, Venice, and Italy, and settling at Rome he was patronized by pope Urban VIII. and made prince of the Roman academy of St. Luke. He was recalled in 1627, after a residence of 14 years at Rome, by Lewis XIII. and he was employed in adorning the palaces of the Louvre, Luxemburg, St. Germain's, and other places. Though he had no genius for grand compositions, and was unacquainted with the rules of perspective, he was a great master in coloring, and to him France is indebted for banishing the insipid and barbarous manner which then prevailed. As the founder of the French school, he had numerous and respectable pupils, le Brun, Perrier, Mignard, le Sueur, Dorigny, and others, who in acquiring celebrity to themselves, reflected high honor on their instructor. He died, worn more with labor than with years, 1641, aged 59. The best part of his work was engraved by his son-in-law Dorigny.

Upton, James, a native of Cheshire, elected from Eton to a fellowship at King's college, Cambridge. He obtained the headship of Taunton grammar school, Somersetshire, and died there 1749, aged 79. He was an excellent scholar, and published a valuable edition of Aristotle's Art of Poetry, and also Ascham's School Master, 1711, with notes, 8vo. His son James, born at Taunton, received his education at Exeter college, Oxford, and obtained Riffington rectory, Gloucestershire, and a Rochester prebend. Besides Observations on Shakespeare, 8vo. he published an edition of Epictetus, 2 vols. 4to. — and Spenser's Fairy Queen, 2 vols. 4to. and died 1760.

URBAN I. pope after Calixtus I. 223, was beheaded seven years after under the persecution of Alexander Severus.

URBAN II. Oddo, a priest of Cluni, made a cardinal by Gregory VII. and chosen pope after Victor

III. 1088. He held the council of Clermont, where the crusade against the infidels was first published. He died at Rome 1099, respected for his wisdom, moderation, and courage.

URBAN III. Hubert Crivelli, archbishop of Milan, was elected pope after Lucius III. 1185, and died two years after.

URBAN IV. James Pantaleon, a native of Troyes, who rose from obscurity to consequence in the church, and on the death of Alexander IV. was elected pope 1261. He published a crusade against Mainfroi king of Sicily, and died 1264.

URBAN V. William de Grimoald, was born at Grifac in the Gevaudan, and was elected pope 1362, after the death of Innocent VI. He removed in 1367 from Avignon, where the popes had constantly resided since 1304, and by fixing his abode at Rome he became popular. In 1370, he again retired to Avignon, and died there at the end of that year. He was a liberal patron to learned and religious bodies, and founded several churches and colleges. He also reformed abuses, and was not, like other popes, lavish of the treasures of the church in enriching his family.

URBAN VI. Bartholomew Prignano, a native of Naples, made archbishop of Bari, and elected to the papedom without the ordinary forms, in a popular sedition 1378. The cardinals soon after chose Robert de Geneva, who assumed the name of Clement VII. and this double election was the source of a schism in the church. Urban supported by England, Hungary, Bohemia, and the empire, exercised the severest cruelties upon his enemies, so that his death 1389, was regarded by the people as a happy event.

URBAN VII. John Baptist Castagna, was elected pope after Sixtus V. 1590, and died 12 days after, much lamented, in consequence of the happy days which the Romans expected from his many virtues.

URBAN VIII. Maffeo Barberini, a native of Florence, elected pope after Gregory XV. 1623. He united the duchy of Urbino to the holy see, and published a bull against the tenets of the Jansenists. He died 29th July 1644. He was an excellent poet, and so good a Grecian that he was called the Attic Bee. His poems consisting of paraphrases from the psalms, odes, hymns, epigrams, &c. have been published at Paris, fol.

URÆUS, Codrus Anthony, a native of Rubiera near Reggio, professor of belles lettres at Forli, and of languages at Bologna. He wrote harangues, satires, epigrams, eclogues, &c. and died 1500, aged 54. His works appeared again 1515, in 4to.

VROON, Henry Cornelius, a native of Haerlem, who in a voyage to Spain was shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal. As he was well skilled in painting, he drew a representation of the storm which had nearly proved fatal to him, and with such success that he met with general approbation. When the earl of Nottingham wished to have the defeat of the armada transmitted to posterity on a suit of tapestry, Vroon was selected for the work, and his execution was equal to the celebrity of the subject. It remains still in the house of lords a monument of his genius, and of the glorious victory of Elizabeth's navy. The time of his death is unknown.

URSINS, Anne Mary de la Tremouille, took for her second husband Flavio des Ursins, and became lady of honor to the queen of Spain. She was a woman of great powers of mind, very intriguing in her conduct, and possessed of such influence in the court that she guided the affairs of the nation. She was banished from Spain 1712, on the marriage of Philip V. with Elizabeth Farnese, and after seeking in vain an asylum at Paris, Genoa, and Avignon, she at last settled at Rome, where she died 5th Dec. 1722, aged 80.

URSINUS, Zachary, a native of Breslau in Silesia. He studied at Wittenberg, and attended Melancthon at the conference of Worms 1557. The next year he was appointed over the academy of Breslau, but when he declared himself a Calvinist he was exposed to severe persecution, and with difficulty found an asylum at Zurich. He was in 1561 invited by the university of Heidelberg to fill the chair of theology, but on the death of his patron Frederic, the elector palatine, he was obliged to abandon his situation. From Heidelberg he removed to Neustadt, where he was appointed divinity professor, and where he died soon after, 1583, aged 49. He was a man of great learning, but in his disposition was violent and passionate. His works have been edited in 3 vols. fol.

URSINUS, John Henry, a Lutheran divine, eminent for his learning in sacred and profane history. He was superintendant of the churches of Ratibon, and died there 14th May, 1667, author of Exercitationes de Zoroastro, Hermete, &c. 8vo. — Sylvæ Theologiæ Symbolicæ, 12mo. — de Ecclesiis German. Origine, &c. 8vo. 1664. His son George Henry was author of Diatribe de Taprobanâ, Cerne, &c. — Disputatio de Locustis — Observationes Philologicæ, &c. — Critical notes on Virgil, &c. He died 10th Sep. 1707, aged 60.

URSINUS, George, a Danish divine, author of Hebrew Antiquities, a work of merit.

URSUS, Nicolas Raymarus, a Danish mathematician. Though originally a swine-herd, and unacquainted with the letters of the alphabet, before his 18th year he made the most rapid progress; and with scarce any instruction he became a very eminent astronomer. He taught mathematics at Strasburg, and afterwards removed at the solicitation of the emperor to Prague, where he died about 1600. He published some mathematical works, and made some discoveries in astronomy, in consequence of which he disputed for a time with Tycho Brahe, about the priority of the discovery of his celestial system.

USHER, James, an illustrious prelate, born of an ancient family at Dublin, 4th Jan. 1580. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, which had been founded by his uncle Henry Usher archbishop of Armagh, and here he acquired so much knowledge and studied with such assiduity, that before his 16th year he had completed a chronicle of the bible as far as the book of Kings, which became the foundation of his great work the Annals. To be more perfectly acquainted with the true doctrines of christianity, he applied himself to the reading of the Fathers, and in 18 years, in his 38th year, after astonishing perseverance he completed this laborious undertaking. Though his friends wished him to follow the law, he preferred divinity, and after his father's death he devoted himself to his favorite pursuits, and gave up the whole of his patrimony, with little exception, to his brothers and sisters to avoid the troubles of law-suits and family quarrels. Soon after he was admitted into orders, he visited England to purchase books and MSS. for Dublin college, and in 1607, he was appointed chancellor of St. Patrick's church, and divinity professor to the university. He was, in 1610, unanimously elected provost of Dublin college, but he declined the honor. Though represented by some of his enemies as a puritan, he was, in 1620, nominated, by James I. to the see of Meath. His reputation was now so great as an author, and as the champion of the protestant church, that the king, a little before his death, promoted him to the see of Armagh, and in this elevated situation he showed himself vigilant and active against the extravagant claims of the catholics, and maintained, by his zeal and exemplary conduct, the dignity of the churchman, and the meekness of the christian. He visited England, with his family, in 1640; but the breaking out of the rebellion, the next year, prevented his return to his diocese, where his palace was nearly destroyed, and all his property plundered. To compensate his losses, the king granted him the bishopric of Carlisle; but as the Scotch armies were quartered there, he derived little or no benefit from the appointment. From Oxford, where he had removed, he retired, in consequence of the ruined state of the king's affairs, to Cardiff, and then to the castle of St. Donat's, in Wales, where he was afflicted with an almost fatal disease. So great was his attachment to his unfortunate master, that he was consulted by him in the treaty of the Isle of Wight, about the government of the church; but though his zeal for the royal cause was unshaken, he remained unmolested. During the usurpation, Cromwell desired once to see him, and treated him with great civility; but never fulfilled the promises which he had made to him in favor of the church. This truly great and virtuous man died 21st March, 1655-6, at the house of lady Peterborough, at Ryegate, Surrey, aged 80, and though he directed to be buried privately, Cromwell ordered his remains to be deposited in Westminster abbey, with great funeral pomp. His valuable library, consisting of 10,000 volumes, printed and manuscript, though solicited by the king of Denmark, and by cardinal Mazarin, was, as he wished, bestowed on Dublin college. As a scholar, Usher was highly respectable, acute as a critic, well informed as a divine, and as a prelate, meek but dignified; the friend of order, religion, and morality. His reputation was so well established for classical knowledge and deep erudition, that, during the civil wars, which distracted his country, he was solicited to accept a professor's chair at Leyden, and invited by Richelieu to settle in France, with a promise of protection, and the free exercise of his religion. His works are, Annals of the Old and New Testament, best edited at Geneva, 2 vols. fol. 1722 — a Body of Divinity, folio — the History of Gotschalch, in Latin — Antiquitates Ecclesiæ Britanicarum, fol. — editions of the Letters of Ignatius, Barnabas, and Polycarp, with learned notes, 2 vols. 4to. — a treatise on the London Edition of the Septuagint tuagint — sermons, &c. His life has been written by Richard Parr, and is found prefixed to his 300 letters, edited at London 1686, in folio.

UTENBOGAERT, John, one of the chief supporters of the Remonstrants, was born at Utrecht, and died at the Hague, 1644, aged 87. Though inferior to his friend Episcopius in genius and penetration, he was his superior in neatness and elegance of style. He published an Ecclesiastical History, fol. — History of his own Life, 4to. &c.

UTENHOVIUS, Charles, a native of Ghent, who studied at Paris, and afterwards went to England, where he defended the government, and the religion of Elizabeth, for which he was liberally rewarded. He returned to Cologne, where he died of an apoplexy, 1600, aged 64. He was the friend of Turnebus, and published, Latin poems — Epistolarum Centuria — Mythologia Æsopica Metro-Elegiaco, 8vo. 1607, &c.

UXELLES, Nicolas Chalons du Blé, marquis d', a French general, distinguished for his defence of Mayence for 56 days, against a powerful besieging army. He was afterwards plenipotentiary at Gertruydenberg and Utrecht, and was made marshal of France. He continued long a favorite at the court of Lewis XIV., and at that of the regent, and died 1730, in a good old age.

W.

W A G

WACE, Robert, a native of Jerley, clerk of the chapel to Henry II. of England, and canon of Bayeux, flourished in the middle of the 12th century, and wrote, Rhon, or the Dukes of Normandy, in French verse.

WADING, Peter, a native of Waterford, in Ireland, who entered among the jesuits, and was professor of theology at Prague, and afterwards at Louvain for 16 years. He was also chancellor of the universities of Prague and Gratz, in Stiria, and was highly esteemed for his virtues and learning. He wrote poems, and various other works in Latin, and died at Gratz 1644, aged 58.

WADING, Luke de, an Irish cordelier, who settled at Rome, where he died 1655, author of Annals of his Order, 4 vols. — Bibliothèque des Ecrivains Cordeliers, &c.

WADSWORTH, Thomas, a native of St. Saviour's, Southwark, educated at Christ college, Cambridge. He obtained Newington Butts, and was remarkable for his charity, but at the restoration he was ejected from the living of St. Laurence Pulteney. He afterwards preached at Newington Theobald's, &c. and died of the stone, 29th Oct. 1676, aged 46, much respected for his piety and learning. His works are the Immortality of the Soul, and on theological subjects.

WAFFER, Lionel, a surgeon of London who made several voyages to the south seas, of which he published an account 1699, translated into French by Montirat, 1706, 12mo.

WAGENSEIL, John Christopher, a learned German, born at Nuremberg, 26th Nov. 1633. He studied at Stockholm and Altorf, and afterwards travelled as tutor to some persons of distinction, with whom he visited Holland, France, Spain, England, and Italy, and received every where those marks of respect and attention which his reputation and learning deserved. Louis XIV. treated him with great liberality, and the university of Orleans honored him with the title of doctor of laws, but though solicited to settle abroad, he preferred literary distinction at home, and after an absence of six years he was placed in the chair of law and history at Altorf. He afterwards exchanged the professorship of history for that of oriental languages, and after being honored with the confidence of the count Palatine of the Rhine, and the notice of the emperor, he died 9th Oct. 1705, aged 72. He wrote a treatise de Urbe Noribergæ, 4to. — Pera Librorum Juvenilium, 12mo. — Tela Ignea Satanae, 2 vols. 4to. &c.

WAGNER, John James, a Swiss physician, librarian to the town of Zurich, and member of the academy of the curious in nature. He published Historia Naturalis Helvetiæ Curiosa, 12mo. and died 1695, aged 54.

WAGSTAFFE, Thomas, a native of Warwickshire, educated at the Charter-house, and New Inn-hall, Oxford, where he took his degrees in art. He obtained Martins-thorp rectory in Rutlandshire, and in 1684, was made chancellor of Lichfield, and rector of St. Margaret Pattens, London. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths, and was deprived of his ecclesiastical preferments, and then practised physic for some years with success. He was in 1693, consecrated suffragan bishop of Thetford, and died Oct. 17, 1712, aged 67. He wrote several tracts in defence of the constitution, according to the tenets of the non-jurors, and he ably supported the title of Charles I. to be author of the Eikon Basilike.

WAILLY, Noel Francis de, a native of Amiens, distinguished as a philologist. He wrote a French Grammar of great merit, often republished — Prin- ciples of the Latin tongue — on Orthography — translations of Cæsar's Commentaries, and Cicero's Orations, 4 vols. 12mo. &c. He died at Paris 1801.

WAKE, William, an eminent prelate born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1657. He was in 1672 admitted at Christ-church, and when in orders he became preacher to the Grays-inn society. In 1689 he took his degree of D. D. and was appointed deputy clerk to the closet, and chaplain to William and Mary, and soon after canon of Christ-church, in 1694 rector of St. James's Westminster, dean of Exeter 1701, bishop of Lincoln 1705, and translated to Canterbury Jan. 1715-16. He was engaged 1697 in a severe controversy with Atterbury with respect to the rights of convocation, but though several of the clergy entered the lists on both sides, the State of the Church and Clergy of England, &c. fol. by Dr. Wake, was the most masterly, luminous and satisfactory performance, published on the subject. In other writings he also ably vindicated the church against the papists, and while he earnestly wished in his discourses, and in his correspondence to form an union between the churches of England and France, he was indefatigable in supporting the rights and tenets of the protestants. This truly learned and virtuous man died at Lambeth 24th Jan. 1736-7, leaving several daughters. Besides his controversial works he published a translation of the epistles of the Apostolical Fathers, 8vo. — Exposition of the church Catechism, often edited — Tracts against Popery — sermons and charges.

WAKE, Isaac, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1598. He was public orator to the university, and afterwards went as ambassador from England to Venice, Savoy, and France. He was knighted, and died abroad 1632. He was author of Rex Platonicus — Discourse on the 13 Helvetic Cantons — on the State of Italy — on the Proceedings of the king of Sweden, &c.

WAKEFIELD, Robert, an eminent divine born in the North of England, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards travelled abroad and acquired such reputation that the emperor appointed him, 1519, professor of Hebrew at Louvain. He, however, soon left the continent for the patronage of Henry VIII. and he became Hebrew professor at Oxford, 1530, and canon of Christ-church. He was author of several Latin pamphlets on the abuses of the papal power — on the Celibacy of the Clergy — Syntagma Hebræorum — a paraphrase of Ecclesiastes, &c. and died in London 1537.

WAKEFIELD, Gilbert, a native of Nottingham, educated under Mr. Woodeson, at Kingston on Thames, where his father was minister, and at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he took his first and only degree 1776. When in deacon's orders he obtained Stockport curacy, Cheshire, and soon after removed to Liverpool and married. He quitted the church in 1779 for the situation of tutor in the dissenting academy at Warrington, and on its dissolution he removed to Hackney college where he continued about one year. The French revolution at this time gave rise to several political publications, and among others Mr. Wakefield excited the public attention by the violence of his attacks, and the animosity of his observations on the conduct of government. These publications were disregarded by the ministry, as the efforts of virulent licentiousness or disappointed ambition, but his letter to the bishop of Landaff appeared so hostile to the interests of the state, and to the safety of the establishment, that he was prosecuted by the attorney-general, and immured for two years in Dorchester gaol. His imprisonment expired May, 1801, but a fever carried him to his grave the following September, in his 45th year. As a scholar he is intitled to high and unreserved praise, and had his talents been always directed in the paths of classical literature, he might have acquired greater fame, and added much to his domestic happiness from the respect and good opinion of men of all parties, and of every denomination. Unfortunately, however, attached to Socinian and leveling principles, he was restless and dissatisfied under a government which afforded him protection and safety; and while he wished to prostrate in the dust the noblest monuments of human wisdom in legislation and in government, he boldly claimed the exercise of an unlimited sway over the opinions, the prejudices, and the attachments of his fellow subjects. The best known of his publications are a collection of Latin poems, with notes on Homer, 1776 — Inquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the three first Centuries concerning the Person of J. C. 4 vols. 8vo. — Sylva Critica — a pamphlet against Public Worship, which gave general offence, and was answered chiefly by dissenters — translation of the New Testament, 2 vols. 8vo. — Tragœdium Græcarum Delectus, 2 vols. 12mo. — Lucretius edited, 3 vols. 4to. — Horace edited, &c. He also published Memoirs of himself, 8vo. little interesting.

WALDECK, Christian Augustus, prince of, an Austrian general, employed in 1789 against the Turks, and in 1792 against the French. He lost an arm at the siege of Thionville, and afterwards distinguished himself with Wurmser in carrying the lines of Weissenburg. He continued to serve his country with high distinction, and in 1798 passed into Portugal where he was named commander in chief. He died 1798, aged 54, highly respected as a general, and as a warrior.

WALDO, Peter, a merchant of Lyons, who in the 12th century, became the founder of the new sect of the Waldenses. The sudden death of a friend by his side, had such an effect upon him that he made a vow of consecrating himself more immediately to the service of God. He distributed his goods to the poor, and as preacher of the gospel collected around him thousands of followers in Dauphiné, Provence, and other provinces of France, but notwithstanding the correct conduct and inoffensive morals of his sect, as he entertained opinions contrary to the interests of Rome, he was declared an enemy to the church, and persecution and war were raised against him. Though thousands fell in this bloody and unequal contest, the sect spread from France to Piedmont, and long maintained itself against all opposition.

WALS, William, an English mathematician who accompanied accompanied captain Cook in his first voyage round the world, as astronomer, and was recommended on his return, to the place of mathematical master at Christ's hospital. He was author of Account of Astronomical Observations in the Southern Hemisphere, 4to. — remarks on Foster's account of Cook's voyage — enquiry into the Population of England, and Wales — Robertson's Elements of Navigation improved — a Dissertation on the Achronical Rising of the Pleiades, inserted in Dr. Vincent's Periplus. He died 1799.

WALKER, Clement, a native of Cliffe, Dorsetshire, educated at Christ-church, Oxford. He was usher to the exchequer, and member for Wells, and ably supported the royal cause, during the civil wars. His opposition to the republican government, was so determined that Cromwell sent him to the Tower, where he died 1651. He was author of the History of Independency 4to. a curious work — the High Court of Justice, or Cromwell's Slaughter-house, 4to. &c.

WALKER, Edward, a native of Somersetshire, who was made secretary at war 1639, and assisted the king at the battle of Edgehill. He was also garter-king at arms, and received from Charles I. the honor of knighthood, and at the restoration was made one of the clerks of the privy-council. He was author of Historical Discourses, fol. — Order of the Ceremonies observed at the celebration of St. George's feast at Windsor 1674 — Acts of the Knights of the Garter in the Civil Wars, &c. and died 1676.

WALKER, Robert, chief painter to Cromwell, died some time before the restoration in an apartment in Arundel-house. One of his pictures of the Protector, was sold to the grand duke of Tuscany for 500l. according to the anecdote mentioned by Horace Walpole.

WALKER, John, a native of Devonshire, educated at Exeter college, and made rector of St. Mary's Exeter, where he died 1725. His attempt towards recovering an account of the sufferings of the clergy, in the great rebellion, fol. 1714, was so honorably received by the public, that the university of Oxford complimented him with the degree of D. D.

WALKER, William, the master of sir Isaac Newton, was successively appointed to the grammar schools of Lowth, and of Grantham, and was rector of Colsterworth, Lincolnshire, where he died 1684, aged 61. He was author of a valuable treatise on English Particles, 8vo. — and other useful works in grammar, rhetoric, and logic.

WALKER, Samuel, an English divine descended from bishop Hall, and born at Exeter, 16th Dec. 1714. He studied at Exeter college, Oxford, and travelled with the son of lord Rolle, and became in 1740, minister of Lanlivery, and in 1746, obtained the living of Truro in Cornwall, where he died 19th July 1761. He was author of two vols. of Sermons, 8vo. — and discourses on the Catechism, 2 vols. 8vo.

WALKER, George, an Irish clergyman, born of English parents in the county of Tyrone, celebrated as the governor of Londonderry, which he gallantly defended against the attacks of James II. till relieved by the English. His valor was handsomely rewarded by king William, whom he accompanied in his Irish campaigns. He was slain at the battle of the Boyne, as he crossed the water.

WALKER, Obadiab, a native of Yorkshire, educated at University college, where he became fellow. Though deprived of his fellowship by the parliament in 1648, he was made master of the college at the restoration, and turned papist to keep his place under James II. He was dismissed from the headship at the revolution, and returned to the house of his pupil Dr. Radcliffe, where he was honorably maintained till his death 1698. He was buried in St. Pancras's church-yard. He wrote among other things a violent pamphlet against Luther and his opinions — Life of Christ, &c.

WALKER, John, an ingenious writer, author of "the pronouncing Dictionary of the English language" and several other works of excellence, on grammar, and elocution. He was for nearly 40 years teacher of elocution, and with such reputation and success, that he acquired a very comfortable competence. His literary as well as his many virtues recommended him to the notice of the learned, and he had among his particular friends and patrons, Dr. Johnson, Edmund Burke, and other eminent characters. He died 1st Aug. 1807, in his 76th year, at his apartments, Tottenham-court road.

WALL, Martin, M. D. a native of Powick, Worcester-shire, educated at Worcester school, and Worcester college, Oxford. He was in 1735 elected fellow of Merton, and afterwards settled at Worcester, where he practised with great reputation. He died at Bath 27th June 1776, aged 68, and was buried in the Abbey church. He had a strong genius for painting, and would have excelled in the art if he had practised it. Two of the frontispieces to Harvey's Meditations were by his pencil. He wrote a treatise on the Malvern waters — some medical tracts, &c. edited by his son at Oxford, in 8vo. 1780.

WALLACE, sir William, a celebrated Scotchman, descended from a poor but ancient family. Feeling for the miseries of his country, he determined to free it from English slavery, and collecting a small but resolute band, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy's troops amounting to 40,000 men, and slew their leader lord Warren. Thus deservedly regarded as the saviour of his country, he was appointed regent of the kingdom during the captivity of John Baliol, and penetrating into England, laid waste the county of Durham with fire and sword. These victories recalled Edward I. from Flanders, he hastened to meet the Scotch, and totally routed their forces, but though defeated, Wallace retired in security to the impregnable fastnesses of the mountains, and defied the power of the English. Disgusted with the jealousy of the nobles, Wallace abdicated his important offices, and lived in privacy, but his valor was so formidable to the English monarch, that he was meanly betrayed into his hands, and treated as a traitor, and after being executed in 1303 his four quarters were hung in derision in the four principal towns of England.

WALLER, Edmund, an English poet, born 3d March, 1625, at Colehill, in Herts, near Amerham. He was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, and was chosen, when scarce seventeen, member for Amerham, in the last parliament of James I. He became became early known to the public, by carrying off a rich heiress against a rival, whose pretensions were espoused by the court, but his matrimonial happiness was of short duration as he was a widower at the age of 25. Though noticed by the court, and flattered by the nobility on account of his wit and vivacity, he did not neglect the muses, but imbibed a deep taste for the beauties of ancient writers, by his acquaintance with Morley, afterwards bishop of Winchester, who for several years enjoyed the comforts of hospitality and friendship under his roof. In his parliamentary conduct he warmly opposed the measures of the court, and in the impeachment of judge Crawley, he spoke with such eloquence and animation, that 20,000 copies of his speech were sold in one day. He was in 1642 one of the commissioners who proposed conditions of peace from the parliament to the king at Oxford, but the following year his popularity vanished on an accusation of a conspiracy to reduce the city of London, and the Tower, to the service of the monarch. In this design he was assisted by some members of parliament, and other inferior persons, but though they were all condemned to death, only two were hanged, and Waller purchased his life and liberty after one year's imprisonment, by a heavy fine of 10,000*l*. After this disgrace he retired to France, and lived chiefly at Rouen, and on his return to England, after some time he paid his court to the men in power, and became a great favorite with Cromwell, whose death he embalmed in the most fulsome language of panegyric. So great was the versatility of his talents, and of his disposition, that after being in confidence with the usurper, he became the favorite of the second Charles, and celebrated the restoration as the happiest of events. He continued also in the good graces of James II., and died of a dropsy at Beaconsfield 1st Oct. 1687, and was buried in the church-yard there, where a monument is erected over his remains. In his character Waller was agreeable and insinuating, his discourse was admired for its keenness, and vivacity, and in the house of commons his speeches were heard with unusual attention, not only from the elegance of his delivery, but the force of his wit, and the quickness of his remarks. Though courted however as a man of the world, he was in other respects, says Clarendon, of an abject temper, without courage to support him in any virtuous undertaking, and of the most insinuating and servile flattery. The virulence which he showed in joining the persecution of Clarendon is not free from censure, and though he was refused, by his means, the office of provost of Eton, he ought to have shrunk from the appearance of an accuser against the virtuous chancellor. As a poet Waller is entitled to the highest praise. He may be called as has been observed, the parent of English verse, and the first who showed us that our language had beauty and numbers. The English tongue came into his hands like a rough diamond, he polished it first, and to that degree, that all succeeding artists have admired the workmanship, without pretending to mend it. Waller was twice married, and left several sons and daughters. The best edition of his works is that of 1730 in 4to. containing his poems, speeches, and letters, with valuable notes by Fenton.

WALLIS, John, an able mathematician, son of a clergyman, born at Ashford, in Kent, 23d Nov. 1616. From Felsted school, he removed in 1632, to Emanuel college, Cambridge, and soon after taking his degree he was elected fellow of Queen's. After living for some time as chaplain in the family of sir Richard Darley, and of lady Vere, he became in 1644 secretary to the Westminster assembly of divines, and married. In 1649 he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and he removed thither from London where he had long resided, and by his efforts laboriously assisted in laying the foundation of the learned body, afterwards denominated Royal Society. He entered at Exeter college, and in 1654, was admitted to the degree of D. D. and four years after he was appointed after some opposition, keeper of the university archives. At the restoration he was received with kindness by Charles II. made his chaplain, and not only confirmed in his academical offices, but selected as one of the divines to review the liturgy. He died at Oxford, 28th Oct. 1703, aged 88, and was buried in St. Mary's church at Oxford, where a monument has been erected to his memory. He left one son and two daughters. Respected as a man of learning, Dr. Wallis was, during the turbulent times in which he lived, universally esteemed for the moderation of his principles, and the mild demeanour which marked his compliance with the various powers in being. Whilst he regarded only the advancement and the interests of religion, of virtue, and of the public good, he lamented the miseries which afflicted his country, and endeavoured, in the enjoyment of privacy and learned ease, to live useful and not great. His works are very numerous; but, though what he wrote on divinity is most respectable, yet it is from his mathematical labors that he has real claims to lasting celebrity. The best known of his works are, Animadversions on Lord Brooke's Nature of Truth, &c. — Animadversions on Baxter's Aphorisms, &c. — Grammatica Linguae Anglicanae, &c. — Elenchus Geometriae Hobbianae, with other pamphlets against Hobbs — Mathesis Universalis, 4to. — Commercium Epistolicum de Questionibus Mathem. 4to. — de Cycloide, &c. — de Aestu Maris Hypothesis, &c. — the works of Archimedes edited, and also Ptolemy's Opus Harmonicum — Appendix de Veterum Harmonicâ, &c. His theological works appeared in 1699, 3 vols. folio, dedicated to king William.

WALLIUS, James, a native of Courtrai, distinguished among the jesuits for his learning and his talents as a Latin poet. He died 1680, aged 81. He wrote elegies — odes — heroic pieces — paraphrases, &c.

WALPOLE, sir Robert, earl of Orford, an illustrious minister, born at Houghton in Norfolk, 6th Sept. 1674. He was educated at Eton, and elected to a fellowship at King's college, Cambridge; but he resigned it on the death of his elder brother, to whose estates he succeeded. He was elected into parliament in 1700, for King's Lynn, and gradually rose to consequence in the nation. In 1705 he became one of the counsellors of George, prince of Denmark, and secretary at war, and in 1709 treasurer of the navy, but lost all his places the next year on the change of the the ministry. In 1711 he was voted by the house guilty of misdemeanors, and of corruption in his office of secretary at war; but though he was expelled from the house, and confined in the Tower, it is fully evident that he owed this disgraceful sentence, not to his own misconduct, but to the violence of his political opponents, who resented his firm attachment to the Marlborough family, and were jealous of the powerful influence of his oratorical powers in the house. His ignominy was regarded as the cause of the Whigs, he was returned for King's Lynn, and though the election was declared void, his constituents nobly persisted in their choice. His attachment to the Hanoverian interest was rewarded on the accession of George I. he was made paymaster-general of the forces, and a privy counsellor, and soon after raised to the arduous office of chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury. His zeal in the impeachment of Oxford, Bolingbroke, Ormond, and Strafford, had rendered him popular in the nation, and a favorite of the court; but after two years the ministry was divided, and sir Robert gave way to the more powerful influence of Stanhope. Now engaged in the ranks of opposition, he directed the shafts of his nervous eloquence against all the measures of the court, and even shared the honors and the popularity of patriotism with Wyndham and Shippen; but by degrees his acrimony softened, and the zealous and watchful defender of public rights became again the fawning courtier, and was restored soon after to the high and responsible situation of premier. Thus the favorite minister of the king, he continued at the head of affairs during the reigns of the first and of the second George, till at last in 1742, the clamor of opposition prevailed, and sir Robert, unable to carry a majority in the House of Commons, retired from his dangerous eminence, and took shelter behind the throne. He was created earl of Orford, and as the reward of his long tried services, the king granted him a pension of 4000*l*. This extraordinary character, who so long guided the destinies of England by the powers of eloquence as well as by intrigue and by corruption, and who, in the possession of ministerial influence, boasted that he knew the price of every man, was, in private life, amiable, kind, and benevolent, and fully deserved the unsolicited and therefore impartial praises of Pope's elegant muse. The last years of his life were spent in retirement and tranquillity on his estate in Norfolk, where he died 18th March 1745-6, aged 71. Lord Orford was author of various pamphlets on political subjects, which have passed into gradual oblivion, with the subjects in which they originated. An interesting and well written account of the administration of lord Orford, has appeared from the elegant pen of Mr. Coxe.

WALPOLE, Horace, youngest son of the preceding, was born 1717, and educated at Eton, where his acquaintance with Gray commenced. In 1734 he went to King's college, Cambridge, and there distinguished himself by his elegant verses in honor of Henry VI. the founder of Eton school. Under the patronage of his father, he obtained in 1738, the office of inspector of exports and imports, which he afterwards exchanged for that of usher to the exchequer, with which he held the place of comptroller of the pipe, and of clerk of the escheats in the exchequer for life, appointments of the annual value of nearly 5000*l*. In 1739 he was permitted by his father to travel on the continent, and accompanied by Gray he made the tour of France and Italy; but a dispute at Reggio unfortunately separated the two friends, whose intimacy was again renewed in 1744, to the honor of both. On his return to England in 1741, he was elected into parliament; but though he sat in the house for above 25 years, he never distinguished himself as a speaker, except on one occasion, in defence of his father in 1742. On giving up his seat in parliament, he retired to his favorite house at Strawberry-hill, near Twickenham, which he had purchased in 1747, and tastefully adorned with all the striking features of Gothic times. In this charming spot the literary hermit opened in 1757 a printing press, where he published first the two sublime odes of his friend Gray, and afterwards edited other works in an elegant and highly finished style. On the death of his nephew in 1791, he succeeded to the title of earl of Orford, but elevation of rank had no charms for him. He never took his seat in the House of Lords, and with reluctance submitted to the respect or adulation of his friends in assuming an empty title, which he contemptuously called a new name for a superannuated old man of 74. Respectable as a man of letters, lord Orford was distinguished for his extensive information; he was polite in his manners, facetious in his conversation, and in his sentiments, lively, intelligent, and acute. If avarice and vanity were, according to one of his biographers, his leading foibles, affability, and a companionable temper were his most distinguishing virtues. He was of a benignant and charitable disposition; but it must be confessed, that no man ever existed, who had less the character of a liberal patron. He died at his house in Berkeley square, 2d March, 1797, aged 80. The best known of his works are, a Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, re-published with great additions by Th. Park, in 5 vols. 8vo. 1806 — Historic Doubts concerning Richard III. — Anecdotes of Painting enlarged from Vertue — the Castle of Otranto, an interesting romance in the marvellous style, written in eight days — Essay on Modern Gardening — the Mysterious mother, a tragedy, &c. His works have been collected together in a splendid edition, 5 vols. 4to. Anecdotes concerning him, his family, &c. have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. called Walpoliana, in 1800.

WALSH, William, an English poet, born at Abberley, in Worcestershire, about 1663. He entered as gentleman commoner at Wadham college, Oxford; but though he left the university without a degree, he applied himself with such assiduity to literature, at home, and in London, that he became, in Dryden's opinion, the best critic of the nation. He was for several years member of parliament, and gentleman of the horse to queen Anne; but he derives greater celebrity from the acquaintance of Dryden and of Pope, than from his intimacy with the great and the powerful. He has been praised by Pope in his Essay on Criticism, and though he possesses not the fame of a great poet, he is to be admired admired for the correctness of his language, and the sportive graces of his muse. The time of his death is not certain, though it is generally supposed to have happened about 1709. His works are, a Dialogue concerning Women, being a Defence of the Sex, 8vo. — letters and poems, amorous and gallant, 8vo. — Essay on Pastoral Poetry — Defence of Virgil — elegies, epitaphs, odes, and songs.

WALSINGHAM, Thomas, a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's, historiographer to the king in the 15th century. His works are, Historia Brevis from the conclusion of the third Henry's reign, where Matthew Paris ends, — and Hypodigma Neustria, both published by archbishop Parker, 1574.

WALSTEIN, Albert, duke of Friedland, distinguished himself in the service of the emperor, and was rewarded with part of the lands of the revolted duke of Mecklenburg. When Germany was invaded by Gustavus Adolphus, he was placed at the head of the imperial armies, and defeated the enemy, though he was afterwards beaten at the battle of Lutzen, 1632. His popularity was such, among his soldiers, that the emperor, afraid of his influence, appointed him a successor; but Walstein, unwilling to yield his power, demanded and received the sworn allegiance of his army, and declared himself independent, 1634. He was murdered a month after, by the cruel and cowardly suggestion of the emperor, who thus cut off an enemy whom he despaired of destroying in the field of battle.

WALSINGHAM, fr Francis, an illustrious statesman, under Elizabeth, born at Chilshurst, Kent, of an ancient family. He was educated at King's college, Cambridge, and improved his knowledge by travelling. He was twice ambassador from England to France, and was, with difficulty, saved from the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew. His services abroad were rewarded at home, with the office of secretary of state, and his vigilance and abilities were directed in establishing the protestant religion, and in strengthening the throne of his sovereign. He possessed such deep penetration, and such address, that he discovered the political intrigues of foreign courts, and by means of the 53 agents, and 15 spies which he entertained abroad, procured the earliest intelligence of the designs of the enemies of his country, and often removed the scruples of his coadjutors by producing copies of the most secret articles of diplomatic confidence. He was, in 1578, sent as ambassador to the Netherlands, and he afterwards visited France and Scotland in the same capacity. This celebrated statesman, whose labors were indefatigable, dedicated to advance the commerce, and the arts of his country, and to patronize literature, died so poor, in 1589, that, on account of his debts, his remains were privately buried by night in St. Paul's church, without any funeral ceremony. He was in his 90th year. He left one daughter, who had three husbands of high distinction; fr Philip Sidney, Devereux, earl of Essex, and Bourke, earl of Clanricard. An account of his negotiations and dispatches have appeared by the title of the Complete Ambassador, in fol. published by fr D. Digges, 1655.

WALTERS, John, M. A. a Welsh divine, educated at Oxford, and made rector of Llandocan, Glamorganshire, where he died 1797. He published an English Welsh Dictionary, 4to. 1794 — a Dissertation on the Welsh Language — sermons, &c.

WALTHER, N. a native of Nuremberg, in the beginning of the 16th century, known as the first who discovered the astronomical refraction of light. He was the friend and the associate of Regiomontanus, whose writings and astronomical instruments he purchased.

WALTHER, Michael, a native of Nuremberg, professor of divinity at Helmstadt. He published, Harmonia Biblica, 4to. — Officina Biblica, 4to. — Mosaica Pastilla, &c. and died 1662, aged 66. His son, of the same name, was divinity professor at Wittemberg, and published some valuable treatises.

WALTHER, Christopher Theodosius, a German missionary to Tranquebar, author of Doctrina Temporum Indica, &c. He died after his return, at Dresden, 1741, aged 42.

WALTHER, Augustin Frederic, professor of anatomy at Leipzig, was author of treatises, De Lingua Humana, 4to. — De Articulis, Ligamentis, & Musculis, 4to. — Academical Dissertations, &c. He died about 1735.

WALTON, Brian, the learned editor of the Polyglott Bible, was born at Cleaveland, Yorkshire, 1600. He studied at Magdalen college, and afterwards at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and then officiated as curate in Suffolk and in London. His learning recommended him to the notice of the great; he became rector of St. Martin's Orgar, London, and of Sandon, Essex, and in 1639, took his degree of D. D., and soon after was appointed chaplain to the king, and prebendary of St. Paul's. His activity in defending the rights of the church, rendered him very obnoxious to the Presbyterians, so that, on the breaking out of the civil wars, he was accused before parliament as a great delinquent, and stripped of his benefices. He escaped with difficulty to Oxford, where he was incorporated in 1645, and where he formed the noble scheme for his Polyglott bible. This most valuable and laborious publication was happily completed in the midst of persecution and of civil war, and made its appearance in 1657, in 6 vols. folio, exhibiting the text in the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Arabic, Ethiopic, Persian, Greek, and Latin languages. His coadjutors in the collating of various copies, were Edmund Castell, Samuel Clarke, Thomas Hyde, Edward Pococke, Whelock, Thorndike, and other learned men. For his services to sacred literature, and his attachment to the royal cause, Walton was, on the restoration, made chaplain to the king, and a little after created bishop of Chester. His reception in his diocese, in the midst of the acclamations of thousands of people, was most flattering to his virtues and popularity, which unhappily was to be short-lived, as he died on his return to London, at his house, Aldergate-street, 29th Nov. 1661. He was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. He published besides, Introductio ad Lectionem Linguarum Orientalium, 8vo. — an able Defence of his Bible — and a pamphlet on the Right of the London Clergy to Tithes.

WALTON, Izaak, an English writer, born at Stamford, Aug. 1593. He for some time kept a shop in the royal exchange, and in Fleet-street, and retired from business with a comfortable competency. He was particularly attached to angling, and he published a most curious and valuable treatise on his favorite amusement, called the Complete Angler, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation, 1653, in 12mo. with cuts, of which a fifth edition appeared in 1676. His time was afterwards usefully employed in compiling accounts of the lives of several of his learned friends, and those which appeared separately have been published together, and exhibit a most pleasing picture of the abilities of the indefatigable author, and abound with interesting and curious anecdotes of men eminent in rank, in talents, and in learning. The characters mentioned are Dr. John Donne, sir Henry Wotton, Hooker, author of Ecclesiastical Polity, George Herbert, and bishop Sanderfon. Walton lived to a good old age, respected and beloved by his friends, in the number of whom were archbishops Usher and Sheldon, bishops Morton, Morley, King, Barlow, Drs. Fuller, Price, Holdsworth, &c. He died at the house of Dr. Hawkins at Winchester, 15th Dec. 1683, aged above 90, and was buried in Winchester cathedral, where an ill written epitaph marks his remains. The best edition of his Angler is by sir John Hawkins, and that of his Lives is that by Zouch, in 4to. Another edition has also appeared at Oxford, in 2 vols. 8vo.

COVENTRY, Nathanael, vicar of Trinity church in Coventry, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and died about 1690. He is author of a curious book, called the Wonders of the Little World, or the History of Man, folio.

WANLEY, Humphrey, son of the preceding, was born 21st March, 1671-2, at Coventry. He preferred literature to the drudgeries of trade in which his father had engaged him, and by the friendship of Lloyd, his diocesan, he went to Edmund hall, Oxford, and afterwards removed to University college. By the kindness of Mr. Nelson, he obtained the office of secretary to the society for propagating Christian knowledge, and he afterwards became librarian to lord Oxford, with a liberal pension. In this occupation he arranged with judicious care the Harleian collection, and kept a curious diary of every occurrence in which he was personally concerned. He made some extracts from the MSS. of the Bodleian, and promised a supplement to Hyde's catalogue of the printed books, and intended a treatise on the various characters of MSS. &c. He travelled through England in search of Anglo-Saxon MSS. for Dr. Hickes, and died universally respected, 6th July, 1726.

WANSLER, John Michael, a native of Erfurt in Thuringia, who, after studying at Königsberg, was employed by the learned Ludolf to come to England, to print his Æthiopic dictionary. The work appeared in London 1661, and the author charged Wansler with inserting several ridiculous and improper things without his permission. Wansler afterwards assisted Dr. Castell in the completion of his Lexicon Heptaglotton, and then was employed by Ernest, duke of Saxe Gotha, to travel into Æthiopia to propagate the Christian religion. He was dissuaded from penetrating to Æthiopia by the patriarch of Alexandria, and therefore, after visiting Egypt, he returned to Europe. Afraid, however, of appearing before the duke, he repaired to Rome and Paris, and was engaged by Colbert to go into the East in search of literary curiosities, and he enriched the French king's library by the purchase of 334 MSS. His conduct, however, displeased Colbert as it had displeased the duke of Saxe Gotha, and he was recalled to Paris as he was preparing to go to Æthiopia, and he died a few years after, neglected by the government, which had before liberally promised him protection, June, 1679, aged 44. He published some Account of Egypt, and also of the Church of Alexandria.

WARBURTON, William, an illustrious prelate, born at Newark in Nottinghamshire, 24th Dec. 1698. He was educated at Okeham school, under the care of Mr. Weston, and was brought up to the business of his father, who was an attorney and town-clerk of the town of Newark. Though he practised for some years as an attorney in his native town, it is believed that he had little business; and consequently he applied those high endowments of classical knowledge which he had industriously acquired at school, to pursuits more congenial to his taste and inclination. In 1724 he published miscellaneous translations in prose and verse from Roman historians, &c. and three years after his Critical and Philosophical Inquiry into the Causes of Prodigies and Miracles as related by historians appeared. His learning and abilities in the mean time recommended him to the notice of Theobald, Concanen, and other wits, and by the friendship of sir Robert Sutton, to whom he had dedicated his two works, he was presented to the living of Burnt Broughton, worth 200l. a-year. In 1728 he was among those created masters of arts in consequence of the king's visit to Cambridge, and he deserved the honor by his merit and his learning. In 1736 he published the Alliance between Church and State, or the Necessity and Equity of an established Religion and a Test Law, &c. and in 1738 appeared his Divine Legation of Moses, demonstrated on the principles of a religious deist, from the omissions of the doctrines of a future state of rewards and punishments in the Jewish dispensation, in six books. This work drew upon him a host of literary enemies, and he was obliged to vindicate himself against their objections and cavils. In 1739 he defended Pope's Essay on Man, and this ensured to him the friendship and attention of this celebrated poet, and a warm recommendation to the learned and the great, and among these to Mr. Ralph Allen, of Prior park. At his death in 1744, Pope left the publication of his works to the judgment of his friend, a bequest worth about 4000l. At that time Warburton published an answer to the objections raised against his Divine Legation, and severely directed his censures against Drs. Middleton, Pococke, Richard Grey and others. On the following year he cemented his intimacy with Mr. Allen by marrying his niece, Miss Tucker, an event which procured to him the opulent inheritance of that gentleman's property, and paved the way to preferment and dignity. Though his abilities were now universally acknowledged as an able divine, and a zealous advocate in favor of the church establishment, he yet received no reward from the gratitude of government. In 1746, however, he was unanimously called by the society of Lincoln's inn to be their preacher; in 1754 he was made king's chaplain, and prebendary of Durham, and also honored with the degree of D. D. by Herring the primate. In 1757 he was advanced to the deanery of Bristol, and two years after his services to religion and literature were rewarded by his nomination to the vacant see of Gloucester. In the last years of his life this learned prelate sunk into deep melancholy, which was aggravated by the loss of his only son, a promising youth, who fell a victim to a consumptive disease. He died in his palace at Gloucester, 7th June 1779, aged 81, and was buried in his cathedral, where a neat monument records his virtues. His wife survived him. His works are very numerous and highly respectable. Besides the Divine Legation, which he corrected and improved, a work often reprinted, in 3 vols. 8vo. and 2 vols. 4to. and the works already mentioned, he published Julian, or a Discourse on the Earthquake and Fiery Eruptions which defeated that Emperor's Attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem — sermons, 2 vols. 8vo. — a View of lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy — a tract on the Lord's Supper — a treatise against the Methodists on the Doctrine of Grace — an edition of Shakespeare, severely criticized in the Canons of Criticism by Edwards — Pope's works, 9 vols. 8vo. &c. His works have appeared together in 6 vols. 4to. edited by his friend and zealous advocate bishop Hurd, with an account of his life. Warburton was founder in 1768 of a lecture at Lincoln's inn to prove the truth of revealed religion from the completion of the scripture prophecies. The character of Warburton is summed up with great discrimination by Dr. Johnson. He was, as he observes, a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge. To every work he brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. His abilities gave him a haughty consequence, which he disdained to conceal or mollify; and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with such contemptuous superiority, as made his readers commonly his enemies, and excited against the advocate the wishes of some who favored the cause. He seemed to have adopted the Roman emperor's maxim, "oderint dum metuant;" he used no allurements of gentle language, but wished to compel rather than persuade. His style is copious without selection, and forcible without neatness; he took the words that presented themselves; his diction is coarse and impure, and his sentences are unmeasured.

WARD, Samuel, D. D. scholar of Christ college, fellow of Emanuel, and in 1609 master of Sidney, Cambridge; was an able disputant. He was also archdeacon of Taunton, and Margaret professor of divinity, and so well known as a divine, that he was sent to the synod of Dordt, where he relaxed from his rigorous attachment to the doctrines of Calvin. He suffered great persecution during the civil war, and was not only expelled from his offices in the university, but treated with such harshness and severity, that he died in consequence, 1643. He was author of some theological tracts, and many of his letters appear in Usher's collection, folio.

WARD, Edward, a man of low extraction in the 17th century, known as the uncouth imitator of Butler's Hudibrastic rhymes. He wrote the Reformation, a burlesque poem — the London Spy — and Don Quixote in Hudibrastic verse. He was in his principles a great Tory, and the public-house which he kept was frequented by persons of his political opinions.

WARD, Seth, an English prelate, well known as a mathematician and astronomer. He was born at Buntingford, Hertfordshire, 1617, and after studying in the school of his native town, he removed in 1632 to Sidney college, Cambridge. By application and good conduct, he recommended himself to the notice of the master of the college, who, though not a relative, was of his own name, and he was elected fellow of the society, but was ejected for refusing to take the covenant. After leaving Cambridge, he was employed as tutor in various respectable families, and on the expulsion of Greaves from the Savilian professorship of astronomy at Oxford, he was appointed to succeed him, and entering at Wadham college, he took the requisite oaths in 1649. In 1654 he had a dispute with Dr. Wallis about precedence in taking their degrees of D. D. and three years after he was chosen principal of Jesus college, but was disappointed by the nomination of Howell to that office by Cromwell. In 1659 he was elected president of Trinity college; but at the restoration he resigned it, and obtained the rectory of St. Lawrence Jewry, and was installed into the precentorship of Exeter church, which a few years before had been presented to him by the expelled bishop. In 1661 he was made fellow of the royal society, and dean of Exeter, and the next year bishop of that see. In 1667 he was translated to Salisbury, and 1671 obtained the chancellorship of the garter, an honor which he had the interest to annex to his successors in the see of Sarum. He unfortunately, in the last years of his life, was deprived of the use of his faculties, and died 1689, a melancholy instance of weak mortality. In his character he was a prudent, pious, and ingenious man, admirably skilled not only in mathematics, but also in all kinds of polite literature, and he was, as bishop Burnet has observed, one of the greatest men of his age. He was author of a Philosophical Essay on the Being and Attributes of a God, &c. — Exercitationes Epistolicae in Hobbii Philosophiam, 8vo. — sermons — a Lecture on Comets — an Idea of Trigonometry — Geometrical Astronomy, &c.

WARD, John, L.L.D. a native of London, educated at Utrecht, where he took his law degrees. He was brought up for the ministry among the dissenters, but obtained the place of clerk in the navy office, which he afterwards resigned, and kept an academy deputy in Moorfields. He was in 1720 elected professor of rhetoric at Gresham college, and three years after fellow of the royal society, and in 1752 one of its vice-presidents. He was in 1751 created doctor of laws at Edinburgh, and in 1753 elected a trustee of the British museum, and he died at Gresham college, 17th Oct. 1758, aged 80. He was author of the Lives of the Gresham Professors, 2 vols. folio — Dissertations on Difficult Passages of Scripture, 8vo. besides editions of Lily's Grammar, and of the Westminster Greek Grammar, and he assisted Horsley in his Britannia Romana, and Ainsworth in his Dictionary, &c.

WARE, sir James, a native of Dublin, the son of the secretary of the lord deputies of Ireland. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and in 1629 he was knighted, and three years after he was, on the death of his father, appointed his successor as auditor-general of the kingdom. In 1639 he was made a privy counsellor; but during the rebellion he was a great sufferer from the violence of the republicans. He came in 1644 as deputy from lord Ormond to Charles I. at Oxford, but was taken at sea on his return, and sent to the Tower. When liberated, he returned to Dublin, and after the surrender of that city, on which occasion he was delivered as an hostage, he was permitted to go to France, and continued at Caen and Paris. On the restoration he recovered his places of auditor-general and of privy counsellor, and died at Dublin, 1st Dec. 1666, aged 62. His works are chiefly on the history and antiquities of Ireland, the best known of which are, de Præfulibus Hiberniæ, folio — the Antiquities of Ireland, folio, &c. His valuable collection of MSS. passed into the hands of lord Clarendon, and afterwards came into the possession of the primate Tenison.

WARGENTIN, Peter, a learned Swede, born 22d Sep. 1717. He became knight of the order of the Polar-star, member of the various learned societies of Europe, and secretary to the academy at Stockholm, where he died at the observatory, 13th Dec. 1783. He published tables for computing the eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, a valuable work, and contributed 52 memoirs to the transactions of the Stockholm academy.

WARHAM, William, a native of Okely in Hampshire. He was educated at Winchester school and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1475. In 1488 he practised as an advocate in the court of Arches, and five years after was sent as ambassador to the court of Burgundy, to solicit the duke not to support the imposture of Warbeck, and he conducted himself so much to the king's satisfaction, that he was appointed chancellor of Wells, and master of the rolls. He was afterwards raised to the dignity of lord chancellor and made bishop of London, and in 1504 translated to Canterbury. The death of Henry VII. greatly altered his situation in the kingdom, and Wolsey the favorite of the new king was raised in his room to the office of chancellor, and soon after acquired the superiority in ecclesiastical affairs, by being nominated legate a latere from the pope. Warham remonstrated in vain against the pride and encroachments of his rival, and died at St. Stephen's near Canterbury, after filling the see 28 years, and was buried in his cathedral without funeral pomp. His memory is entitled to respect, not only from his munificence, piety, and moderation, but his liberal patronage of Erasmus and other learned men.

WARIN, John, a native of Liege, famous as an engraver and sculptor. His abilities recommended him to the patronage of Lewis XIII. who appointed him inspector of the royal mint, and engraver general. He engraved the seal of the French academy representing Richelieu, which is regarded as his most perfect piece. His two busts of Lewis XIV. in bronze, and of cardinal Richelieu in gold, are also deservedly admired. He was so avaricious in his character, that he compelled his daughter to marry a man greatly deformed but very rich, and this had such an effect upon the feelings of the unfortunate bride that she poisoned herself ten days after her nuptials, by swallowing sublimate in an egg. He was poisoned himself at Paris by some rival artists, 1672.

WARING, Edward, a native of Shropshire, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge. He was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics in 1760, and two years after published his valuable book, Miscellanea Analytica, 4to. He was admitted to the degree of doctor of medicine 1767, and died 1798. He was author besides of Meditationes Analyticae — Proprietates Algebraicarum Curvarum, besides communications to the philosophical transactions, &c.

WARNER, Ferdinando, LL. D. vicar of Roude, Wilts, rector of St. Michael's Queenhithe, London, and of Barnes, Surrey, was author of a system of divinity and morality, on the most important points of natural and revealed religion, &c. 5 vols. 12mo. reprinted in 4 vols. 8vo. 1756. He published besides some single sermons — Life of sir Thomas More — the History of Ireland, 1 vol. 4to. — History of the Rebellion and Civil War in Ireland, 4to. — Boltingbroke, or a Dialogue on the Origin and Authority of Revelation — an Account of the Gout, &c. This laborious author died of the gout, Oct. 3d 1768, aged 68. His son John, was educated at Cambridge, where he took his degree of D. D. 1773. He obtained Hockliffe and Chalton livings in Bedfordshire in 1771, and afterwards Stourton, Wilts. He was author of a learned treatise on the pronunciation of Greek, called Metron Ariston, and he also translated from the Spanish, the life of Friar Gerund, in 2 vols. 8vo. He was for some time chaplain to the English embassy at Paris, and died 1800.

WARNER, Richard, a learned botanist, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. Though called to the bar he never followed the profession, but chiefly passed his time at his seat at Woodford Green, Essex, employed in those botanical pursuits which he loved. He wrote Plantæ Woodfordienfes, or a catalogue of the plants in his neighbourhood, 8vo. — Letter to Garrick on a Glossary to Shakespeare, 8vo. — Translations of some of Plautus' Comedies, &c. He left his valuable library to Wadham college, and died 1775.

WARTON, Thomas, a native of Godalmin, Surrey, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1718 to 1728, and obtained the living of Basingstoke, Hants, and Cobham, Surrey. He died 1745, and two years after appeared a volume of his poems, 8vo. He is particularly known by his ingenious epigram on the occasion of George the second sending a troop of horse to Oxford, and a collection of books to Cambridge.

WARTON, Joseph, son of the preceding, was born 1722, at Dunsfold, Surrey, where his mother's father the Rev. Joseph Richardson was rector. He received his education at Winchester school, but as he was superannuated and thus disabled from admittance on the New college foundation, he entered at Oriel college, Oxford. In the university he distinguished himself by his application and regularity, and published there his Enthusiast, his dying Indian, and a satire on Ranelagh house. He left Oxford after taking his first degree, and was created M. A. in 1757 by diploma, and in 1768 he was admitted to the degree of D. D. In 1751 he went to France as the companion of the duke of Bolton, to whom he was chaplain, with the intention, it is said, of marrying him at Paris on the expected death of his duchess, to Polly Peachum of licentious memory, but he returned to England soon after, and thus was prevented from solemnizing the nuptials of his amorous patron. He obtained from the duke Wynslade rectory in Hampshire, to which was added in 1755 Tunworth living. In 1755 he was elected to the second mastership of Winchester school, and in 1766 he was placed at the head of this celebrated foundation, which after an honorable and laborious service he resigned in 1793. In 1782 he was presented to a prebend of St. Paul's by Lowth, and to the living of Chorley, Hertfordshire, and in 1788 he obtained a stall in Winchester cathedral and Easton rectory, which he afterwards exchanged for Upham. This amiable and deservedly respected character died at his living of Wickam in Hampshire, 23d Feb. 1800, and his remains were deposited in Winchester cathedral, where the gratitude of his pupils has erected a monument, and paid a due and becoming tribute of reverence to the abilities, the genius, and the virtues, of their beloved instructor. Dr. Warton married in 1748, Miss Daman, who died 1772, and the year after he took for his second wife Miss Nicholas. His elegant and interesting essay on the genius and writings of Pope appeared in 1756, and to it he added a second volume in 1782. He projected the history of the revival of literature, but little progress was made in the work. In 1797 he published his edition of Pope's works, and soon after began an edition of Dryden's works which he never completed, though the first 2 vols. were published with notes. As a poet his character is very respectable, but his merits are still greater as a critic and commentator, and the services which he has rendered to the public as an active, vigilant, and enlightened preceptor, have deservedly endeared him in the esteem and the affection of numerous pupils, on whose minds his superior abilities, and his sound judgment, deeply imprinted a lasting taste for elegant literature, and for all the beauties of poetical composition. Memoirs of his life and writings have been published in 2 vols. 4to. by his respectable pupil Dr. Wooll.

WARTON, Thomas, D. D. brother of the preceding, was born in 1728, and educated at Winchester school and Trinity college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship in 1751. He had already distinguished himself by the publication of five pastoral eclogues, when on the appearance of Isis, a poem by Malon, he was encouraged by Dr. Huddersford the head of his college, to stand forth the champion of the university, and he soon after produced the Triumph of Isis, a poem of great merit, which rivalled the elegance and the popularity of the Cantabrigian bard. In 1753 he published his Observations on Spenser's Fairy Queen, and the following year he was particularly honored with the notice of Dr. Johnson in his visit to the university. In 1756 he was elected professor of poetry for 10 years, and in his lectures he evinced his abilities as a polished scholar, and an acute critic. The Anthologia Græca by Cephalæ, was edited by him in 1766, and four years after his Theocritus issued from the press in 2 vols. 4to. with valuable notes. He was admitted into the antiquarian society in 1771, and in that year obtained from lord Lichfield the small living of Kiddington, Oxfordshire. The life of sir Thomas Pope the founder of his college appeared in 1771, and in 1774 his first volume of the History of English Poetry, and the second which brings the account down to the accession of Elizabeth, four years after. Though in some respects a tedious performance from the long quotations of obsolete passages, the whole is a valuable acquisition to British literature, and the records of our more ancient poets are presented to view in a pleasing and interesting form, whilst the genius of the author enriches and diversifies the dry narrative with acute remarks, judicious explanations, and appropriate anecdotes. The death of Whitehead in 1785, made room for his appointment to the laureatship, and at the same time he was chosen Camden professor of history. His last publication was Milton's smaller poems, elucidated with curious notes, illustrative of the allusions and beauties of the great poet. Blessed with an uninterrupted flow of health, and in the possession of comfort and independence in the midst of the enlightened society of his college, Warton knew little of the concerns or calamities of life, till in his 62d year he felt a serious attack of the gout. A journey to Bath removed the troublesome complaint, and he promised himself more years of health and of intellectual enjoyments, when after spending a cheerful day in the common-room of his college, he was seized with a paralytic stroke, 20th May 1790, which terminated his existence on the following day. He was buried with academical honors in the college chapel, and a short inscription on the pavement marks the spot where his remains were deposited. In his character, Warton was affable and easy, his conversation was full of anecdotes, and he aspired to the name of a ready and frequent punster. As a critic he displayed great judgment, elegant taste, and strong discriminating powers, and as a poet he is entitled to no mean praise. In his imagery he is bold, clear and lively, he paints with correctness, and in his descriptions of rural scenes he is singularly happy, happy, rich and interesting. The best of his poems are, the Progress of Discontent — the Suicide — and the ode on the king going to Cheltenham; and among the various subjects which he has attempted it is remarkable that he never sung of love. He has, as one of his biographers observes, visited many a Grecian isle, but he never touched at Paphos. His Mons Catharinæ is also an elegant Latin poem; but the chief work on which his fame is built, is his History of Poetry, of which a third volume collected from his papers has appeared.

WARWICK, for Philip, an eminent writer, born in St. Margaret's parish Westminster 1608. He was educated at Eton, and after travelling over France and visiting Geneva he returned to England, and became secretary to Juxon, the treasurer and clerk to the signet. He was also in parliament, and opposed the impeachment of Strafford, but on the breaking out of the civil war he retired to Oxford with the king, whose confidence he much enjoyed. He was in 1646 one of the royal commissioners empowered to treat with the parliament, and the next year he attended his master in the isle of Wight as his secretary. At the restoration he was returned member for Westminster, and was knighted and replaced in his situation of clerk to the signet. He died 15th Jan. 1682, and was buried in Chislehurst in Kent, where he had purchased an estate. His chief work is, Memoirs of the Reign of Charles I. continued to the restoration, 8vo. 1701, a work of great merit, candor, and integrity. He wrote besides discourses on government, &c.

WASER, I. H. an ecclesiastic of Zurich, known for his writings, and chiefly for his sufferings. He inserted in a German journal, some severe animadversions on the administration of public affairs in Zurich, for which he was arrested by the magistrates, and condemned to death. He was beheaded 27th June 1780.

WASER, Anna, daughter of a senator at Zurich, excelled as a painter in oil, and particularly in miniatures. She died 1713 aged 34.

WASHINGTON, George, the illustrious founder of American independence, was born 1732, in the county of Fairfax in Virginia, where his father Augustus Washington, was possessed of great landed property. He was descended from an English family, which emigrated from Cheshire, about the year 1630 for a settlement in Virginia. He was educated under the care of a private tutor, and after making rapid progress in mathematics, and engineering, he embraced the military profession. His abilities were first employed by general Dinwiddie in 1753 in making remonstrances to the French commander on the Ohio, for the infraction of the treaty between the two nations, and he afterwards negotiated a treaty of amity with the Indians on the back settlements, and for his honorable services received the thanks of the British government. In the unfortunate expedition of general Braddock he served as his aid-de-camp, and when that brave but rash commander fell in an ambush, he displayed great military talents in conducting the retreat to the corps under colonel Dunbar, and in the saving the remains of the army, from a dangerous and untenable position. He retired from the service with the rank of colonel, but while engaged in the peaceful employments of an agriculturist at his favorite seat of Mount Vernon, he did not refuse the civil offices of his country, but appeared as a senator in the national council for Frederic county, and afterwards for Fairfax. In the unhappy quarrel which separated the American colonies from the mothercountry, he was early selected by the leaders of the insurrection, as a proper person to command the provincial troops, to inspire them with confidence, and to unite under his standard their wavering and undisciplined ranks. From the moment when he took upon himself the important office of commander in chief, at Cambridge, June 1775, he employed the great powers of his mind to his favorite object, and by his prudence, his valor, and his presence of mind, he deserved and obtained the confidence and the gratitude of his country, and finally triumphed over all opposition. Distinguished by the name of the American Fabius, he shewed himself master of the knowledge of military stratagems, and while some presumed to blame his precautions as cowardice, he proved that he could fight, whenever he calculated upon the prospect of decisive advantages, or certain victory. A more rash general might have endangered the safety of his country, by venturing to face openly the disciplined troops of England in the field, but the sagacious general knew that cautious operations, and vigilant delay would prove, without loss to himself, more decisive than the most brilliant victory over an enemy, whose resources were supplied with difficulty from the distant shores of Europe. After seeing the independence of his country established in the treaty of peace of 1783, the heroic chief resigned his high office of commander to the congress, and in the midst of the applauses, the admiration, and the tears of his fellow citizens, he retired to the obscurity of a private station. With becoming firmness he declined the honors offered to his active administration, by the gratitude of America, he defrayed all his military expences, during the long period of the eight years of the war, and modestly declared himself satisfied with the recollection of the services which he had performed, and with the good opinion of his fellow citizens. Such patriotism naturally pointed him out for the highest offices of the state, and in 1789 he was called to fill the dignity of president, for which his wisdom and moderation so fully qualified him. It was a period of great difficulty, the unsubdued spirit of liberty in America was again kindled into a flame by the revolutionary events of France, and not a few of the Americans sighed at home for that freedom and equality, which seemed to promise more extensive happiness, and more lasting blessings to the renovated subjects of Lewis XVI. Washington foresaw and anticipated the plans of the factious, the prudence and firm moderation of his administration checked insurrection, discontent was silenced, and the people of the Alleghany and Washington counties, which the intrigues of Genet the French envoy had roused to rebellion, were convinced of the wisdom of their measures, and of the wisdom of their governor. The virtuous president completed in 1796 the business of his temporary office by signing a commercial treaty with Great Britain, and then resigned his power, at a moment when all hearts and all hands were united again to con-

ter upon him, agreeable to the general wish, the sovereignty of the country. Restored to the peaceful retirement of Mount Vernon, he devoted himself to the cultivation of his lands, and though he accepted the command of the army in 1798, it was more to unite together the affections of his fellow citizens, to one general point, the good of the country, than to gratify any desires of ambition or of pride. This great man expired at his seat, rather unexpectedly, after a few day's illness, 14th Dec. 1799. He was buried with due national honors, America, in a public mourning, deplored in him the loss of her father and of her friend, and a new city was erected on the borders of the Potomack, which in becoming the capital of the United States, records to distant times, in bearing his name, the services, the patriotism, and the glories of her great and illustrious founder. Wisdom, says a contemporary writer, was the predominant feature in the character of Washington, in his military and political career. His patience, his forbearance, his firmness, in adverse as well as in prosperous events proved of more solid advantage to his country than his bravery and his talents. Though perhaps inferior to other great characters in the extent of his ideas, and the boldness of his plans, he surpassed them far in wisdom, in moderation, in integrity. The history of his life, is the history of American independence, and though there may be in America men who decry his services, while they forget his noble disinterested resignation of sovereign authority, it is much to be feared that many generations shall not elapse, before some equally fortunate, but more ambitious chief, may boldly seize the reins of absolute dominion, and establish an usurped power, over the rights, the fortunes, and the liberties of his bleeding, but enslaved country. A copious account of his life, has lately been published by judge Marshall in five large vols. 8vo. collected from the private papers of his family, and from the public records of the state.

WASSE, Christopher, author of a translation of Grotius' catechism into Greek verse, and of Gratius' Cynegeticon into English, was for some time fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and afterwards superior beadle in law at Oxford. He died 1690.

WATELET, Claude Henry, receiver general of finance member of the French academy, and of several foreign learned societies, paid much attention to literature, and travelled to Italy, and the low countries, to improve himself. He died poor 13th Jan. 1786, aged 68. He is author of a poem on the art of painting, in 4to. and 8vo. and of some comedies — operas — and a prose poem from the Aminta of Tasso — a Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving. His Opuscula were published together 1788.

WATERLAND, Daniel, an English divine, born 1683 at Wafely, Lincolnshire, where his father was rector, and educated at Lincoln school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1713 master. He became successively rector of Ellingham, Norfolk, chaplain to the king, rector of St. Austin, and of St. Faith, London, chancellor of York, archdeacon of Middlesex, canon of Windsor, and vicar of Twickenham. He died 1740, and was buried at Windsor. He was author of sermons preached at lady Moyer's lecture, of which he was the first preacher — treatise on the Eucharist — history of the Athanasian creed — a vindication of the Trinity against Dr. Samuel Clarke, with whom he was engaged in a long and acrimonious controversy — and other theological works.

WATERLOO, Anthony, a native of Utrecht, distinguished as a painter in the 16th century. His pictures are scarce but bear a very great price.

WATRIN, Henriette, Helen, and Agatha, three sisters at Verdun, who were accused of having strewed flowers in the way of the king of Prussia, when he entered their town. Tinville the public accuser of the revolutionary tribunal, recommended to them to deny the charge, but they refused to purchase their liberty by a falsehood, and perished on the scaffold in 1793, pitied by thousands.

WATS, Gilbert, D. D. a native of Yorkshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He translated into English, Davila's History of the Civil wars, and lord Bacon's treatise de Augmentis Scientiarum, fol. and died 1657.

WATSON, John, a native of Rengworth, Worcestershire, educated at All Souls college, Oxford. He studied medicine, but under Elizabeth he took orders, and rose in 1572 to the deanery. and eight years after to the bishopric of Winchester. He wrote among other things a Latin tragedy called Abisalom, and died 1589.

WATSON, Thomas, M. A. minister of St. Stephen, Walbrook, was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and lost his preferment, for nonconformity, at the restoration. He wrote the body of Divinity, a course of sermons, on the assembly's catechism, fol. and some other theological works, and died 1673.

WATSON, James, a native of Aberdeen, brought up to the printing business under his father. In 1711 he obtained a patent from queen Anne, with Mr. Freebairn, and then published several valuable works. He printed in an elegant manner a bible in 8vo. 1722, and in 4to. 1726, and another in very small size, and of great beauty. He died at Edinburgh, 1728.

WATSON, David, M. A. a native of Brechin, in Scotland, educated at St. Leonard's and St. Andrew's where he became professor of philosophy. On the union of his college with St. Salvador's in 1747, he retired to London, where he published his prose translation of Horace, 2 vols. with notes, a popular work. His manner of life was very irregular, and brought him into many difficulties, and he at last sunk a victim to his licentious pursuits, and was buried at the expence of the parish 1756. He published also the history of the heathen Gods and Goddesses.

WATSON, Robert, a native of St. Andrew's, educated in his native town, from which he passed to Glasgow, and to Edinburgh. He took his degree of doctor of laws, and became professor of logic, rhetoric, and belles lettres at St. Andrew's, and afterwards principal of the college. He died 1780, and three years after his death, appeared his history of the reign of Philip III. of Spain, in 1 vol. 4to. and in 2 vols. 8vo.

WATSON, John, a divine born 26th March, 1724, at at Lyme-cum-Hanley, in Prestbury parish, Cheshire. From Manchester school he came to Brazen-nose college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and afterwards he obtained the living of Meningsby, Lincolnshire, which he resigned in 1769, for the valuable rectory of Stockport, Cheshire. He devoted himself to the compilation of the history of Halifax, which appeared in 1775, and died March 14th 1783. He wrote besides an history of the antient earls of Warren, and Surrey, to prove the claim of his patron, sir George Warren, to these antient titles.

WATSON, Henry, a native of London eminent as a lecturer in anatomy, and as the author of an account of the Absorbents of the Urinary Bladder, was elected in 1761 surgeon of Westminster hospital, and died 1793, aged 91. He contributed besides, some papers to the philosophical transactions.

WATSON, sir William, a native of London, educated at Merchant Taylors'. He applied himself to the medical profession, and in 1741, was made member of the royal society. He was complimented in 1757, with the degree of M. D. by the universities of Halle, and Wittemberg, and in 1762 he became physician to the Foundling hospital. He was made member of the college of physicians, in 1784, and two years after knighted by the king. He wrote various tracts on electricity collected into one vol. 8vo. and as he had paid particular attention to that branch of philosophy, and contributed some curious experiments, to the royal society, in 1744 he was honored with the Copley medal from that learned body. He died universally respected 1787.

WATTEAU, Anthony, a native of Valenciennes, of obscure origin. Self-instructed, he gradually rose to eminence, and after visiting Italy, and studying the beauties of Rubens, and other illustrious artists, he was admitted member of the French academy of painting, and obtained a pension from the king. He afterwards visited England, which he was obliged to quit on account of the ill state of his health. He died soon after at Nogent near Paris, 1721, aged 37. His pieces are particularly striking for their originality, the grace of his attitudes, the lightness of his figures, and the delicacy of the whole. His conversation pieces are his best performances, and in these the airs of the heads deserve particular admiration.

WATTS, Isaac, a respectable divine among the dissenters. He was born at Southampton, 17th July, 1674. His great abilities early displayed themselves, and he was in 1690 placed under the care of Mr. Thomas Rowe in London, where he completed his studies, and where he had among his fellow students Horte, afterwards archbishop of Tuam. In 1696 he went into the family of sir John Hartop, Stoke Newington, as tutor to his son, and in 1702 he was appointed successor to Dr. Chauncey in the pastoral office. Though his constitution was weak, and his health disordered by frequent illness, he not only paid particular attention to the duties of his office, but wrote some valuable works on subjects of divinity. In the latter part of life he became acquainted with sir Thomas Abney, in whose family he found an asylum of friendship and hospitality, and where he died 25th Nov. 1748, aged 75. He had been in 1728 honored in a very flattering manner and unsolicited, by the universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, with the degree of D. D. and the useful publications which he sent to the press deserved the high distinction. In his character he was an amiable man, mild, generous, and charitable, and it may be said of him that few have left behind such purity of conduct, or such monuments of laborious piety. His works are very numerous and respectable, the best known of which are, a treatise on Logic — an Essay on the Improvement of the Mind — Introduction to Astronomy and Geography — hymns — and a poetical version of the Psalms sung in dissenting congregations — Horæ Lyricæ, chiefly on religious subjects — Scripture History in Question and Answer — Miscellaneous Thoughts, 12mo. — two volumes of sermons — Philosophical Essays, &c. The whole have been collected into 6 vols. 4to.

WEAVER, John, author of the Loves of Mars and Venus — of Orpheus and Eurydice — of Perseus and Andromeda, pantomimic dramas — of an History of the Mimes and Pantomimes of the Ancients — of the Art of Dancing — with a treatise on Action and Gesture, &c. was a dancing master, and died in London about 1730.

WEBB, Philip Carteret, an able antiquarian, born 1700. He was bred up to the law, and acquired great eminence as a parliamentary and constitutional lawyer. He published in 1747 Observations on the Course of Proceedings in the Admiralty, and in 1751 he was employed in obtaining the charter of incorporation for the Antiquarian society, to whose labors he sent some valuable communications. He was returned member for Haslemere in 1754 and 61, and became one of the joint solicitors to the treasury; but during the question about general warrants, and in the prosecution of Wilkes, he expressed his disapprobation of the measures of the government, and published some pamphlets on the occasion. He died at his house at Busbridge, near Haslemere, 22d June 1770, aged 70. His valuable library and MSS. were sold by public auction for 17 days, and his other curiosities also passed into the hands of different collectors. He wrote several pamphlets of considerable merit, and chiefly on temporary subjects in law, antiquities, &c.

WEBB, Benjamin, son of a shoe-maker at Redcross, became known as the master of Bunhill-row school, where he died 1774, aged 49. He was very ingenious in his calculations, &c. and he was employed in writing copies of honorary freedoms bestowed by the city of London on eminent persons, and that which he prepared for the king of Denmark in 1768 was particularly admired.

WEBSTER, William, an able writing-master, author of a compendious Course of Mathematics, 3 vols. 8vo. translated from the French of la Hoste — Book-keeping — and a treatise on Arithmetic, often edited. He kept a school in Castle-street, near Leicester-square, where he died 1744, aged 60.

WECHER, Christopher, an eminent printer at Paris. He began to print Greek books in 1530, and with such correctness, that scarce an error could be discovered in a folio volume. This accuracy is attributed to his able corrector the learned Sylburgius.

He

He exposed himself to the persecution of the church for printing some offensive and controversial books, and died soon after 1552. His son Andrew, retired from Paris because he was a protestant, and settled at Frankfurt, where he carried on with great success the printing business. A catalogue of the books which he and his father printed was published in 8vo. He died 1581.

WEEVER, John, a native of Lancaster, educated at Cambridge. He is author of Funeral Monuments, lastly edited in 4to. 1767, a work of singular service to antiquarians and historians, though greatly deficient in point of accuracy. He died about 1632, and was buried in St. James's church, Clerkenwell.

WEIMAR, Bernard, duke of Saxe, early distinguished himself in arms against the house of Austria, whose severities to his family he strongly resented by espousing the cause of Gustavus Adolphus. Though defeated at Nordlingen, he repaired his losses, and at the head of a large army, entrusted to his command by Lewis XIII. he quickly overran Franche Comté, Burgundy, and Alsace, and would have obtained more important advantages had not death stopped his career. He died 18th July, 1639.

WELBY, Henry, a native of Lincolnshire, of a very eccentric character. In consequence of an attempt on his life by his brother, he quitted his native county, where he had extensive estates, and retired to the privacy of an obscure house in Grub-street, London, where for 44 years, either through superstition or melancholy, he suffered himself to be seen by no one till his death in 1636.

WELLENS, James Thomas Joseph, bishop of Antwerp, is distinguished for his learning, and his private and public virtues. He published Exhortationes Familiares de Vocatione Ministrorum, &c. 8vo. and died at Antwerp, 1784, aged 58.

WELLER, Jerome, a native of Freyberg in Misnia, known as the friend and favorite of Luther. He wrote Commentaria in Libros Samuel & Regum — Consilium de Studio Theolog. &c. — Commentaria in Epistol. ad Ephesios, &c. all collected into 2 vols. folio, and he died at Freyberg, 1572, aged 73.

WELLER, James, a native of Newkirk in Voigtland, professor of theology, &c. at Wittemberg, where he died 1664, aged 62. He wrote Specilegium Quæstion. Hebræo-Syriacæ — and a Greek Grammar.

WELLES, Samuel, M. A. an English divine, born at Oxford, 18th Aug. 1614, and educated at Magdalen college there. He proved an active minister during the civil wars, though he retired from persecution, and settled at Remenham, Berks, from which he afterwards removed to Banbury, Oxfordshire. He was much beloved by his parishioners for his eloquence as a preacher, and his charitable and benevolent deportment as a man. He wrote a Spiritual Remembrancer, and died after the restoration.

WELLS, Edmund, a native of Corsham, Wilts, educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of D. D. He became professor of Greek in the university, and obtained the living of Cotesbach, Leicestershire, where he died 1730, aged 65. He wrote, besides pamphlets against the dissenters, and an answer to Dr. Clarke on the Trinity — a Course of Mathematics for young Gentlemen, 3 vols. — a work of merit on the Geography of the Old and New Testaments, 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

WELLWOOD, James, M. A. a native of Perth, educated at St. Andrew's. The troubles of the times prevented him from entering into the ministry, and after concealing himself from the persecution of his political enemies, he was attacked by a fever, and died at Perth, 1680, aged 32. He was author of Immanuel's Land, and other tracts.

WELLWOOD, Thomas, M. D. a native of Edinburgh, educated at Glasgow. He fled to Holland with his father, who had been suspected of being concerned in the murder of archbishop Sharpe in 1679, and after studying medicine at Leyden, and taking his degrees, he returned with William at the revolution, and was nominated one of the royal physicians for Scotland. He acquired a respectable fortune by his extensive practice, and died at Edinburgh, 1716, aged 64. In his principles he strongly favored the republican government, and published Memoirs of England from 1588 to 1688, well written, though with the spirit of party.

WELSTED, Leonard, a native of Abington, Northamptonshire, educated at Westminster school. He obtained a place in the ordnance office by the friendship of lord Clare, but in the midst of his occupations he devoted much of his time to the muses. He wrote epistles, odes, &c. — a translation of Longinus on the Sublime, from Boileau's version — the Genius, or the duke of Marlborough's Apoplexy — an Epistle on the duke's Death — the Triumvirate, &c. which was considered as an attack on Pope, and consequently procured the author an honorable place in the Dunciad. He wrote besides, the Dissembled Wanton, a comedy, 1726, and other things, which were much applauded in his day, and which appeared collected into one vol. 8vo. 1787, with a Vindication of his Character by a relation. His little poem called the Apple Pie, written at Westminster school, was for a long time attributed to Dr. King, and printed among his poems. Welsted was much noticed by the great and the learned, and his poetical talents were respectable, and displayed genius, and though he did not perhaps rise to the sublimer flights of the muse, his compositions were entitled to praise. He was twice married, but left no children. He died at the house which he held from his official situation in the Tower, 1747, aged 58.

WENCESLAUS, son of Charles IV. emperor of Germany, succeeded his father in 1378, at the age of 15. Though he promised the highest virtues for the ornament and the glory of the throne, he became debauched, capricious, and tyrannical, and at last he was deposed in 1400 by the electors of the empire. He died king of Bohemia, 1419, aged 58. In his character he united all the extravagance of Antony, the infamous cowardice of Heliogabalus, and the bloody passions of Tiberius. Though twice married, he left no issue.

WENTWORTH, Thomas, earl of Strafford, was born in London 1594. After finishing his education at Cambridge, he travelled abroad, and succeeding to a family estate of 6000*l.* per annum, in Yorkshire, he was elected into parliament, and became a leading member of the House. His eloquence in opposition to the measures of the court was so powerful that he was named sheriff of Yorkshire, that he might not be elected into parliament; after, however, maintaining such determined opposition to the king, he was gained over by the ministry, and the grant of a peerage, and the office of president of the council in the northern counties, rendered him a loyal subject. This dereliction of principle highly offended his old political friends, and Pym, to whom he wished to justify his conduct, told him, "though you have left us, I will not leave you whilst your head is on your shoulders." In 1631, he was sent as deputy to Ireland, and in his government he was a most zealous and active representative. He redeemed the incumbrances of the royal revenue, he improved the yearly income 40,000*l.* a year, and prevailed upon the clergy of Ireland to conform to the doctrines and the discipline of the English church. Notwithstanding these important services, he was arbitrary in his conduct, and his severity towards lord Mountmorris, whom, in the course of two hours, he caused to be condemned to death, because he had spoken disrespectfully of him, reflects eternal disgrace on his memory. The king rewarded the faithful administration of his viceroy with every mark of favor and honorable distinction, but whilst he was secure of the royal confidence he lost the good opinion of the nation. Pym, too true to his promise, inveighed against him in parliament, and at last accused him before the House of Lords, as the cause of all the acts of tyranny that prevailed, and as the greatest enemy to the liberties of his country. His impeachment drawn up in 28 articles, engaged the attention of the nation for 18 days, but when his noble and energetic defence seemed to influence the decisions of the lords, the commons, with persecuting virulence, passed a bill against him, attainting him of high treason. The king used all his influence to save this faithful minister, but his compassion was answered by the cries of the factious, who insulted him with the exclamations of justice! justice! and even threatened his person if he refused to sacrifice him to the popular indignation. Charles was relieved from his deep distress; and when the earl, with ill requited generosity, entreated him by letter not to hazard his safety, nor the peace of the kingdom for his sake, but to assent to the sacrifice of his life, which might become a means of reconciliation between the injured sovereign and his rebellious subjects, the monarch, after two days and two nights of dreadful perplexity, signed with the greatest reluctance the fatal instrument which conducted his friend to the scaffold. He suffered with great resignation on Tower-hill, 12th May, 1641. At the restoration his attainder was reversed as dishonorable to the nation. His letters have appeared in 2 vols. fol. 1739, by Dr. Knowles.

WERDMULLER, John Rodolph, an historical and landscape painter of Zurich. He was unfortunately drowned in crossing a river near Zurich, 1668, aged 27.

WERENFELS, John James, a divine of Basil, author of sermons in German, of homilies in Latin, &c. He died 1655. His son Peter became professor of theology at Basil, and died there 23d May, 1703, aged 76. He was author of some learned dissertations, sermons, &c.

WERENFELS, Samuel, son of Peter, was born at Basil, where he filled some professorial chairs with great celebrity. He travelled into Holland, Germany, and France, and was the correspondent of the learned of Europe. He died at Basil, universally respected for his learning and for his many virtues, 1 June, 1740, aged 83. His works which are chiefly on subjects of theology, philosophy, and philology, have appeared in 2 vols. 4to. The best known of his works is de Logomachiiis Eruditorum.

WERFF, Adrian Vander, a painter of Rotterdam. His portraits and historical pieces were finished with correct taste and judgment, and procured him the patronage of the great and the powerful. His pieces are preserved in the Dusseldorf gallery. The best are his 15 pieces on the mysteries of the christian religion. He died in his native town 1727, aged 68. His brother Peter was his pupil, and became eminent also in historical pieces. He was an hypocondriac in the latter part of life, and died 1718, aged 53.

WESENBEC, Matthew, a native of Antwerp, professor of law at Jena, and at Wittenberg, where he died 1586, aged 55. He wrote observations on the Pandects, 4to. and fol. and other works on jurisprudence.

WESLEY, Samuel, a native of Winterborne Whitchurch, Dorsetshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at Dorchester school, and then entered as servitor at Exeter college, Oxford, 1684. By means of the duke of Buckingham he obtained the living of South Ormesby, Lincolnshire, and afterwards Epworth in the same county, where he died 25th April, 1735. The best known of his publications are Life of Christ, a heroic poem, folio — the History of the Old and New Testament, attempted in verse, &c. 3 vols 12mo. — Maggots, or Poems, &c. — Elegies on queen Mary, and on Tillotson — a letter concerning the Education of the Dissenters, &c. — treatise on the Sacrament — Dissertations on Job, &c. He has been ridiculed by Garth for the inelegance of his poetry, but though indifferent as a poet, he was very respectable as a man. He left a large family, four of whom are not unknown in the history of English literature. The eldest of these Samuel was educated at Westminster and elected to Christ church, Oxford. He was afterwards usher of Westminster school for near 20 years, and then obtained Blundel's school at Tiverton. He was presented to no ecclesiastical benefice, and died at Tiverton 6th Nov. 1739, aged 49, and was buried in the church-yard there. He is author of the Battle of the Sexes — the Prisons Opened, two poems of merit, and the Parish Priest — an eulogy on his Wife's Father, &c. His poems appeared in 1736, 4to.

and in 1743, 12mo. He is said to have presented to the Spalding society an annulet that had touched the head of the three kings of Cologne.

WESLEY, John, the great founder of methodism, son of Samuel, was born at Epworth, Lincolnshire, 1703. In 1714 he was placed at the Charter-house, and two years after he was elected to Christ-church, Oxford, and in 1725, was ordained deacon by bishop Potter, and the next year became fellow and tutor of Lincoln college. He early expressed himself against the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed, and was one of that small society at Oxford which was formed on principles of greater austerity and devotion, than prevailed in the university, and which consequently received the appellation of methodists. In 1735 he embarked at Gravesend for America, at the request of the trustees of the new colony of Georgia, who were anxious for the conversion and spiritual instruction of the natives and settlers, and in this new theatre he, accompanied by his brother Charles, displayed his strong powers of eloquence and persuasion in the cause of methodism. Here, though much engaged in spiritual affairs, Wesley gave way to the emotions of love, but Miss Causton, the object of his passion, growing impatient at his delay, gave her hand to a more favored suitor, and the modern saint, who compared the disappointment to the plucking out of his right eye, carried his pique and resentment so far as to repel the virtuous bride from the altar at the administration of the sacrament. This gross attack upon the character of a woman whom he wished to have taken for a wife, was resented by the lady, who published to the world some transactions not very honorable to the sanctity of the preacher, in consequence of which he hurried away from the public odium of America. In 1738 he landed at Deal, and began his career of proselytism. Believing himself to be set at liberty from the bonds of sin by divine illumination, he soon saw himself followed by a crowd of admiring converts, and zealously delivered his doctrines in his conventicle which was first established in Fetter-lane. His discourses were heard with enthusiastic admiration and superstitious deference, the number of the faithful was rapidly increased, and the pious founder of the sect, by the solemn imposition of hands, sent forth his apostles to propagate the faith. In 1751 he married Mrs. Vizelle, a widow lady of independent fortune, but whatever might have been the motives to this union, it proved unfortunate, and showed that, however calculated Wesley might be for the head of a sect, he was very unwilling to spare attention to the comforts or happiness of his bride, who fled in disgust from his home. The great increase of his followers, no doubt, flattered the pride of the saint, and to that he devoted the whole of his active life in the midst of dangers, of troubles, and of corporeal fatigues. Impressed with the idea that his great success was the immediate influence of heaven, his adherents easily believed that he was inspired, and that methodism was the work of God. But whilst he affected humility in his intercourse with the multitude, with all the strong powers which constitute the leader, with coolness, perseverance, and popular eloquence, he kept in his own hands the supreme authority over his sect, and the whole spiritual machine was moved according to his direction, so that in the most distant corners of the empire, his censures had as much the weight of law and correction upon his delegates as if he had himself personally pronounced the sentence of reproof or dismissal. This extraordinary character, who for more than half a century exercised the most absolute authority, and with undiminished effect, over his followers, died on the 2d March, 1791, in his 88th year, and the 65th of his ministry. Though the sermons which he published are superior to those of his fraternity, they must be considered as loose and desultory, conveying little to the mind, but, by familiar allusions or vulgar imagery, commanding the attention of the ignorant multitude. It has been doubted whether he was in his spiritual career hypocritical, or sincere, and actuated more by interested pride, than unspotted piety and unfeigned love, but though he was ambitious of power, greedy of pre-eminence, and impatient of contradiction, it is plain, that he was influenced by motives of benevolence, and that his zeal in the cause of methodism, was directed whether by proper or improper means, to promote the future happiness of man. He published various tracts, and controversial pamphlets, against the Calvinists, and Moravians. An interesting account of the Rise and Progress of Methodism, has been published by Mr. Nightingale, and the Life of Wesley has appeared from the pen of John Whitehead, one of his followers, in 2 vols. 8vo.

WESLEY, Charles, younger brother of the preceding, was born at Epworth, and from the care of his father, passed to Westminster school, of which he became captain. He was elected, in 1726, to Christ-church, Oxford, and after taking his degrees, embraced, with warmth, the religious tenets of his brother John, whom he accompanied in his mission to Georgia. After various adventures in his intercourse with the Indians, he returned, in 1736, to England, and became a zealous and active preacher to the people of his own persuasion. As he was well skilled in scripture divinity, and of a warm, lively character, his discourses were much admired among the methodists. Though occasionally resident in London, he was chiefly employed as an itinerant preacher among his adherents. He died 1788, aged 79. He was respectable as a poet, and his religious pieces are also numerous. His two sons, Charles and Samuel, have been celebrated as very great poets in music.

WESSELUS, John, a native of Groningen, who studied at Zwool and Cologne, and afterwards at Paris. Sixtus IV. who was well acquainted with his learning, and with his abilities, was no sooner raised to the papal chair, than he sent for him to Rome, and offered him whatever he wished. The modest Wesselus requested the gift of a Hebrew and Greek bible in the Vatican. Why do not you ask for a bishopric, inquired the astonished pontiff, because, answered the disinterested ecclesiastic, I do not want one. He soon after returned to his country, where he died 4th Oct. 1489, aged 70. He was, in his opinions, occasionally unfriendly to the the tenets of the Romish church, and many have regarded him as the forerunner of Luther. He wrote various things, some of which appeared at Leipzig 1522, and Groningen 1614, in 4to. under the title of Farrago Rerum Theologicarum.

WEST, Gilbert, a learned writer, educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, for the church. He, however, entered into the army, and afterwards held some civil offices, and was appointed clerk extraordinary to the privy council in 1729. He married some time after, and settled at Wickham, Kent, where he devoted himself to literary and religious pursuits, and where his retirement was frequently visited by Lyttelton and Pitt, who, weary with faction and political debates, courted his society, and the tranquillity of his abode. Though thus noticed by the great, it was not till 1751 that he could obtain an increase to his narrow fortune by the appointment of a clerkship to the privy council, to which was afterwards added the place of treasurer to Chelsea hospital, by the kindness of Mr. Pitt. These honors, however, came too late; the loss of his only son, in 1755, embittered the short remainder of life, and on the 26th of March, 1756, a stroke of the palsy hurried him to his grave at the age of 50. He was a man of polished manners and great erudition, and so respectable, that, it is said, the care of the young prince's education was offered to him, which he declined, because he considered his mode of superintendence not sufficiently extensive. His works are Observations on the Resurrection, 1747, a work which obtained for him, from the university of Oxford, the honorable degree of LL. D. — Pindar's odes translated into English, a valuable, elegant, and spirited composition.

WEST, James, M. A. of Alicot, Warwickshire, was educated at Baliol college, Oxford, and in 1741, was elected into parliament for St. Alban's. He was soon after made one of the joint secretaries to the treasury, which he resigned in 1762, and three years after he obtained, by the favor of the duke of Newcastle, a pension of 2000l. a-year. He was member of the antiquarian society, and for some time president of the Royal society. He died 2d July, 1772. His valuable MSS. were purchased by lord Shelburne, and his printed books were sold by auction in 24 days, his prints and drawings in 13, his coins and medals in seven, his plate curiosities in seven, and his pictures, drawings, &c. in four.

WEST, Richard, of the Temple, was made king's counsel in 1717, and in 1725, raised to the dignity of lord chancellor of Ireland. He married a daughter of bishop Burnet, and died 1726. He was author of a Discourse on Treasons and Bills of Attainder — treatise on the Manner of creating Peers, &c.

WEST, Thomas, the ingenious author of the history of Furness abbey, and of a guide to the lakes, was for some years professor of natural philosophy in the universities on the continent. He spent much time in describing the beauties of the lakes, &c. and in visiting those spots which are so remarkable for sublimity and extent of view. He chiefly lived in the latter part of life at Ulveston, and died there much respected, 10th July, 1779, aged 63.

WEST, Elizabeth, a native of Edinburgh, who became known for her eccentricities and mystical opinions. She wrote an account of her life, and died at Saline 1735, aged 63.

WESTFIELD, Thomas, a native of Ely, educated at Jesus college, Cambridge. He obtained the livings of Mary-le-Bow, and St. Bartholomew's London, and was made archdeacon of St. Alban's and soon after raised to the see of Bristol by the king, who thus rewarded his soundness of judgment, his learning, and his unblameable conversation. Though at first respected and beloved in his diocese, he was exposed to the ridicule and persecution of the republicans, and at last ejected from his see. He died 25th June 1644. His sermons were published after his death in 2 vols. He was so eloquent and so pathetic a preacher that he was called the weeping prophet.

WESTON, Richard, a native of Leicester, who though occupied in the business of a thread hosier, paid particular attention to horticulture, and contributed some valuable and curious observations to the Gentleman's Magazine on the subject. He also published various useful tracts on his favorite pursuit, and died at Leicester 19th Nov. 1806, aged 74.

WESTSTEIN, John Rodolphus, a learned native of Basil, who succeeded his father as professor of Greek and of theology. He published among other valuable works, Dialogue of Origen against the Marcionites — Exhortation to Martyrdom, &c. and died in his native town 1711, aged 64. His brother John Henry, was well skilled in the learned languages. He settled in Holland, and acquired great celebrity as a printer, and died 1726, aged 77. He was respected by the great and the learned, and the prefaces which he prefixed to the works which he edited, proved that he was a man of abilities and of deep erudition.

WESTSTEIN, John James, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Basil. He travelled over Switzerland, France, England, and Germany, to examine the various MSS. of the Greek testament, and on his return home he published his Prolegomena 1730. The work was no sooner read than it created him a multitude of enemies, who accused him before the council of Basil as a Socinian, in consequence of which he was stripped of his ecclesiastical honors, and obliged to fly from his country. He was received with distinction at Amsterdam, and placed in the professorial chair of le Clerc, in philosophy, an appointment which he held with great reputation, till his death 24th March, 1754, in his 61st year. His edition of the New Testament with the various readings, and with critical remarks was published in 1751-2, in 2 vols. fol. He published with that work two epistles of Clemens Romanus in Syriac, with a Latin version, of which he ably defended the authenticity. In reward for these useful labors he was honorably elected member of the Royal societies of London and Berlin.

WHALLEY, Peter, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Merchant Taylors' and at St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was chosen in 1768 master of the grammar school of Christ's hospital, which he resigned in 1776, and was soon after placed at the head of St. Olave school in Southwark. He obtained some preferment in the church, St. Sepulchre's vicarage, Northampton, and afterwards St. Margaret Pattens, and Horley, Suffex. He died 1791. He wrote an Enquiry into the Learning of Shakspeare, 8vo. — Vindication of the Authenticity and Evidences of the Gospels, 8vo. — Ben Jonson's Works with notes, 7 vols. 8vo. — Verses prefixed to Hervey's Meditations — sermons, &c. and he was for some years engaged in making collections for an history of Northamptonshire, which was never completed.

WHARTON, George, a native of Westmoreland, whose property was ruined in the civil wars, in consequence of his strong attachment to the royal cause. During the usurpation he maintained himself by writing almanacs, tracts on astronomy, chronological works, &c. His sufferings were rewarded at the restoration, he was made a baronet, and appointed treasurer of the ordinance. He died about 1681.

WHARTON, Anne, daughter of sir Henry Lee, of Ditchley, Oxfordshire, inherited conjointly with her sister lady Abingdon, her father's estates. She became the wife of Thomas, marquis of Wharton, and distinguished herself by her learning and poetical works. Several of her poems have appeared in Dodsley's and Nichols' collections. She died about 1685.

WHARTON, Henry, a learned divine, born 9th Nov. 1664, at Worstead in Norfolk, where his father was vicar. He was educated under the eye of his father, and afterwards entered at Caius college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in art. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Dr. Cave, and of Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom he was appointed chaplain, and from whom he received the vicarage of Minster, and the rectory of Chartham in Kent. His application to literary pursuits was so great that his health at last sunk under it, and he died at Canterbury, 5th March, 1695, aged 31, universally lamented. His publications were numerous and valuable, the best known of which are, a treatise on the Celibacy of the Clergy against the Church of Rome — Defence of Pluralities, 8vo. — Specimens of Errors in Burnet's History of the Reformation — Historia de Episcopis & Decanis Assavenfibus, 8vo. — Anglia Sacra, five Collectio Historiarum de Episcopis, &c. 2 vols. fol. — History of Laud's Troubles, and Trials — sermons, 8vo. &c.

WHARTON, Philip, duke of, an English nobleman, remarkable for his great eccentricities, born 1699. His early marriage with a woman of inferior rank, though of amiable and virtuous character, proved the beginning of his misfortunes, and flying from those domestic comforts which were within his reach, he plunged into all the follies, the crimes, and the extravagance of a licentious age. In his travels on the continent he paid his court at Avignon to the chevalier de St. George, and was complimented with the title of duke of Northumberland. His partiality for the fortunes of the exiled Stuarts, was, however, forgotten; on his return home, he became the zealous supporter of the ministry, and for his eloquent services in parliament he was raised from the dignity of marquis to that of duke. Unsteady in his politics he soon changed sides, and distinguished himself not only as the bold defender of the bishop of Rochester, but as the publisher twice a week of a violent periodical paper called the True Briton. His extravagances had now so injured his property, that his creditors obtained possession of his income under a decree of chancery, and therefore to avoid that disgrace of sinking from a high station into contempt and poverty, he retired to the continent, and at the court of Spain openly espoused the cause of the pretender. After filling Madrid and Rome with his intrigues and deceiving by the levity of his conduct both the Spanish court and the chevalier of St. George, he formed the plan of revisiting his country, though he heard that an indictment for high treason was issued against him. He proceeded as far as Rouen, but new difficulties arose, and his want of money obliged him again to return to Spain, and he died soon after at Terragone, where he had gone for the benefit of the waters, May 1731. His remains were interred with little ceremony by the charity of the Bernardine monks of a neighbouring convent. On the death of his wife in 1726, he married another, who though the daughter of an Irish colonel, was one of the maids of honor to the queen of Spain.

WHALEY, William, a native of Lancashire, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge. He obtained a living in Cheshire, and died 1613. He was an able advocate in favor of the protestant religion against the Roman catholics, and he wrote, among other things, an Exposition of the ten Commandments, &c.

WHEARE, Degory, a native of Jacobstow in Cornwall, educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford. He became fellow of Exeter college, and afterwards travelled on the continent. He was patronized by lord Chandos, and was appointed by Camden the first professor in the lecture which he had founded, and he obtained also the mastership of Gloucester hall, which he held till his death in 1647, in his 74th year. He was author of a Dissertation de Ratione & Methodo legendi Historias, 8vo. a useful work, translated into English by Edmund Bohun — Parentatio Historica, &c. — Epistolarum Eucharist. Fasciculus, &c.

WHEATLEY, Charles, a native of London, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He afterwards became lecturer of St. Mildred in the Poultry, and vicar of Brent and Ferneaux Pelham, Hertfordshire, where he died 1742, aged 56. He wrote a Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, fol. republished in 8vo. — Historical Vindication of the 85th Canon, &c. — Answer to Hoadly on the Sacrament — Private Devotions at the Sacrament — Sermons at lady Moyle's Lectures, 8vo. — Miscellaneous Sermons published after his death, 3 vols. 8vo.

WHEELER, George, a native of Charing, Kent, was born at Breda, where his parents lived in exile during the civil wars. He entered at Lincoln college, Oxford, but before he took his degrees he began to travel, in company with Dr. James Spon of Lyons, and visited Venice, Constantinople, Asia Minor, the various countries of Greece, Zante, &c. The observations of these two learned travellers were ingenious, and as they minutely compared the relations of Pausanias, with the existing state of the country, they were enabled to trace with accuracy every striking feature of difference.

ference and of improvement. On his return to England Wheeler presented to the university of Oxford several valuable antiquities, and was in consequence complimented with the degree of M. A. Though a knight he took orders and obtained the living of Balingstoke, and besides the valuable rectory of Houghton le Spring, Durham, and a prebend in Durham cathedral. In his private character he was an amiable and devout man. He was created D. D. by diploma 1702, and died Feb. 18, 1724, aged 74. Besides his journey into Greece, in 6 vols. fol. 1682, he published an account of the churches and places of assembly of the primitive christians, 8vo. 1689 — and the Protestant Monastery, or Christian Economics, 12mo.

WHICHOT, Benjamin, an English divine, born 1609 at Stoke in Shropshire. He was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a fellowship. He afterwards obtained the living of Northcumbury, Somersetshire, from which he was withdrawn by the parliamentary visitors to become provost of King's college, in the room of Dr. Collins who was ejected. At the restoration he was removed from the headship of the college, and then settled in London, where he became minister of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, and afterwards of St. Lawrence, Jewry. On a visit to Cambridge he caught a violent cold, and died soon after, May, 1683, at the house of his friend Dr. Cudworth, master of Christ college, and he was buried in his church of St. Lawrence, Jewry, where his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tillotson. His sermons were published after his death, the first volume by Shaftesbury, the author of the Characteristics, three more by Dr. Jeffery of Norwich, and another volume by Dr. Samuel Clarke, 1707.

WHISTON, William, a learned English divine, born 9th Dec. 1667, at Norton near Twycrosse, Leicestershire, where his father was rector. He received his education under his father, and afterwards was two years at Tamworth school, and then entered at Clare hall, Cambridge. In 1693 he became fellow of his college and soon after tutor, but the labors of this important office were too great for his delicate constitution, and he resigned his numerous pupils to become chaplain to bishop Moore. His New Theory of the Earth appeared in 1696, and excited general admiration, though its principles were opposed by Dr. Keill. In 1698 he was presented by his patron the bishop to the living of Lowestoft in Suffolk, where he devoted himself assiduously to his parochial duties, till he was invited in 1700 to Cambridge, to become deputy to sir Isaac Newton, whom he soon after succeeded in the Lucasian professorship of mathematics. About this time his attachment to the principles of the church of England began to waver, he pretended to discover that the two first centuries of the church were truly Eusebian and Arian, and that afterwards doctrines less congenial to the genuine spirit of christianity had been adopted. These opinions which were heard with astonishment by his friends, engaged much of the public attention, but he disregarded the opposition and censures of his former associates, and wrote several works in support of his sentiments, and in vindication of his conduct. This drew upon him the severe displeasure of the university, and in 1710 he was deprived of his professorship and banished from the precincts of Cambridge. Regardless of the disgrace he retired to London, where he maintained himself by giving lectures on philosophy, astronomy, and divinity, and by writing on his favorite topic of primitive christianity. The scanty pittance which he thus derived was scarce sufficient to supply him with the necessaries of life, yet he was cheerful and serene, and in the midst of his distresses, he often found the hand of those who revered him for his learning, his integrity, and piety, extended to relieve his wants. Though he had regularly frequented the church of England, he at last forsook it in 1747, when the officiating clergyman read, in allusion to him as he supposed, the Athanasian creed, and he then repaired to the baptist meeting, till as he observed, he had an opportunity of setting up a more primitive congregation himself. He died after a week's illness, 22d Aug. 1752, aged 84, and was buried near his wife, by whom he had several children, and who had died 18 months before him, at Lyndon in Rutlandshire. He was, as bishop Hare observes, a fair unblemished character, who all his life had cultivated piety, virtue, and good learning. Constant himself in the private and public duties of religion, he promoted virtue in others, and such learning as he thought would conduce most to the honor of God by manifesting the greatness and wisdom of his works. By his useful works of philosophy and mathematics, he endeavored to display the glory of the great creator, and to his study of nature he early joined the study of the scriptures. The best known of his works are, besides his Theory — Astronomical Lectures, 8vo. — translation of Josephus, with eight valuable dissertations, 4 vols. 8vo. — Astronomical Principles of Religion — History of the Old and New Testament, 6 vols. 8vo. — Vindication of the Testimony of Phlegon — Memoirs of his own Life, 2 vols. 8vo. and several theological pieces in defence or support of his favorite doctrines.

WHITAKER, William, D. D. a native of Holme, Lancashire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He became regius professor in the university, and master of St. John's college, where he died 1595, aged 47. Though he wrote some tracts against popery, and in favor of the church of England, he is supposed to have inclined to the puritans. Bishop Hall said of him, "never a man saw him without reverence, or heard him without wonder."

WHITBY, Daniel, D. D. a native of Rushden, Northamptonshire, educated at Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1664. He was afterwards chaplain to Seth Ward, bishop of Salisbury, and under his patronage became chanter of the cathedral, rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, and prebendary of Taunton Regis. He died 24th March 1726, aged 88. In his character he was easy, affable, devout, pious, and charitable, little acquainted with worldly affairs, and more attentive to the business of religion, and to the pursuits of learning. His publications are more than 40 in number, and display good sense and learning. The best known of these are, the Protestant Reconciler, 1682, which gave great offence to

to the clergy, and was publicly burnt by the university of Oxford—five Points against Calvinism, 8vo. — Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, 2 vols. folio, often re-edited.

WHITE, John, a bishop in the reign of Elizabeth, deposed for preaching a seditious sermon. He wrote some theological works in Latin, and died 1559.

WHITE, Richard, a miscellaneous writer. His works were in Latin, and chiefly on subjects of English history. He died at Douay, 1612.

WHITE, Francis, bishop of Ely under the first James, was author of some sermons and controversial tracts against Fisher. He died 1637.

WHITE, Thomas, lecturer of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and St. Anne's, Aldersgate-street, was author of the Art of Divine Revelation, a book of merit. After the restoration he preached to the prisoners in Ludgate, and was kindly noticed by bishop Sheldon.

WHITE, Thomas, or Albius, a Roman catholic priest, principal of a college at Lisbon, and sub-principal at Douay. He was an able scholar, and so warm an admirer of Aristotle's philosophy, that he applied his principles to explain some of the most mysterious parts of the Christian religion. Some of his pieces have been inserted in the Index Expurgatorius. He was intimate with Hobbes, though in their opinions they widely differed. He died 1676.

WHITE, Thomas, a native of Bristol, who studied at Magdalen college, Oxford, and obtained the livings of St. Gregory, and St. Dunstan in the West, London. He afterwards became prebendary of St. Paul's, canon of Windsor, and Christ-church, and treasurer of Salisbury. He was author of some sermons, and founded an alms-house in his native town, besides a lectureship at Oxford, and liberal donations to Sion college in London. He died 1623.

WHITE, Jeremy, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and chaplain to Cromwell, is known for his humor and vivacity. He showed particular attention to one of the protector's daughters, and being once surprized by the father on his knees before the lady, he averted the indignation of Cromwell by saying, that he was intreating her interference with her maid, to whom he had long paid his addresses without hopes of success. Cromwell, who knew the artifice of the lover, upbraided the maid for her supposed unkindness, and immediately ordered a clergyman to perform the ceremony of marriage between her and the astonished chaplain. He wrote a book on the Restoration of all Things, published after his death, in which he maintained that all mankind are doomed to inherit salvation. He died 1707, aged 78.

WHITE, Robert, an engraver of eminence, who was pupil to Loggan. His likenesses were strikingly correct and expressive, and his attention to business was so intense, that it is said he engraved more portraits and other works than any other artist. He died 1704.

WHITE, Nathaniel, pastor of the dissenting congregation at the Old Jewry, was born in Pall-Mall, and educated under Doddridge and Caleb Ashworth. He published some funeral sermons, &c. and died March 3d, 1783.

WHITEFIELD, George, one of the founders of the sect of the methodists, was born at Gloucester, where his mother kept the Bell inn, 1714. From the Crypt school of his native town, he entered as servitor at Pembroke college, Oxford, and was ordained at the proper age by Benson, bishop of Gloucester. Enthusiasm and the love of singularity now influenced his conduct, and in his eagerness to obtain popularity, he preached not only in prisons, but in the open fields, and by strong persuasive eloquence, he prevailed upon multitudes to regard him as a man of superior sanctity. In 1738 he went to America, to increase the number of his converts; but after laboring for some time as the friend and the associate of the Wesleys, he at last was engaged with them in a serious dispute, which produced a separation. While he zealously asserted the doctrine of absolute election and final perseverance, agreeable to the notions of Calvin, his opponents regarded his opinion as unsupported by scripture, and therefore inadmissible, and in consequence of this arose the two sects of the Calvinistic and the Arminian methodists. Secure in the good opinion of a great number of adherents, and in the patronage of lady Huntingdon, to whom he was chaplain, he continued his labors, and built two Tabernacles in the city and in Tottenham-court road for the commodious reception of his followers. He died while on a visit to his churches in New England, America, 1770, and had the satisfaction to know that his adherents were numerous on both continents. His sermons, letters, and controversial tracts, have been published together in 7 vols. 8vo. and an account of his life has appeared by Gillies.

WHITEHEAD, Paul, an English poet, born in London, on St. Paul's day, from which circumstance he derived his Christian name. Though originally intended for business, and apprenticed to a mercer, he despised the drudgery of the counter, and entered at the Temple to study the law. By unfortunately joining with Fleetwood the player, in a bond of 3000l. he brought misery upon himself, and languished for some years in the Fleet prison. He afterwards maintained himself by his writings, and at last, through the friendship of lord le Despenser, he obtained a patent place of 800l. for life. He published the State Dunces — Manners — Honor — Satires — the Gymnasiad, a mock-heroic poem, to ridicule the brutish business of boxing, addressed to Broughton, the then famous champion of the order. He wrote also an Epistle to Dr. Thompson, besides some songs and epigrams. He died 30th Dec. 1774, aged 64, and was buried with great pomp at Wycombe, by the directions of his friend lord le Despenser.

WHITEHEAD, William, an English poet, born at the beginning of 1715, at Cambridge, where his father was a baker. By the kindness of Mr. Bromley, afterwards lord Montfort, who generously exerted himself in favor of his family, he obtained, at the age of 14, a nomination to Winchester college, and he had there the honor of obtaining a prize for a poem which Pope set to the scholars of the college when he visited the school in company with his friend lord Peterborough. Though very respectable in the school for abilities abilities and learning, he lost the election to New college for want of friends, and in consequence entered at Clare hall, Cambridge, where, as the son of a baker, he had a claim to a scholarship. In 1742 he became fellow of the college, and soon after engaged in the family of lord Jersey, as tutor to his son, and to his friend, afterwards general Stevens. The leisure which he enjoyed amidst the comforts and the independence of his situation, directed his thoughts to dramatic composition; and he produced his Roman Father and his Creusa, which were received with great applause. In 1754 he accompanied his noble pupil and lord Nuneham on the continent, and after visiting the German courts, he passed to Italy, and returned through Switzerland, Germany, and Holland to England in 1756. The views of Rome, and the monuments of her departed greatness, were not lost on the imagination of a man of genius and of taste, and on his return the poet presented to the public his elegy written at Haut-villiers — his ode on the Campagna of Rome — and five eclogues. By the interest of lady Jersey, he was appointed secretary, and register to the order of the Bath, and two years after he succeeded Cibber in the honorable office of poet-laureat. Thus deservedly raised to comfortable independence he continued the friend and the associate of the two noblemen over whose education he had so usefully presided, and the many days which he passed, in honorable hospitality, and in cheerful conversation, at Nuneham, and Middleton parks, were proofs of the goodness of his heart, as much as of the virtues, and the grateful generosity of his pupils. In the midst of these pleasing assiduities of friendship, he devoted much of his time to the muses, and besides the occasional odes which loyalty, and official duty claimed from his pen, he wrote the School for Lovers, a comedy acted at Drury-lane, 1762, and Charge to the Poets, a satirical poem. The Trip to Scotland, a farce, appeared about 1771, and in 1775, the poet collected together, and published his poems. As as he grew older Whitehead felt more sensibly a palpitation of the heart, and a difficulty of breathing, with which for nearly 40 years, he had been occasionally afflicted, and these disorders at last proved fatal. He died suddenly, after a short confinement, in consequence of a cold, at his lodgings, Charles-street, Grosvenor square, 14th April, 1785, and was buried by the direction of his friend general Stevens, in South Audley-street chapel. Besides the above mentioned pieces, Whitehead wrote Variety — the Goat's beard — Venus attiring the Graces, &c. and though he may not claim a distinguished feat among the first bards of Britain, he must hold a respectable rank in the temple of fame, as an elegant poet and a nervous writer. As a private man, his virtues were many, and deservedly recommended him to the friendship and patronage of the great. An account of his life has been published by his friend Mason.

WHITEHEAD, John, a methodist preacher. He was well educated, and with a mind panting after distinction, he quitted the trade of linen-draper at Bristol, and then kept a school at Wandsworth, where he was patronized by the quakers, whose principles he had adopted, after abandoning the society of the methodists.

He next travelled on the continent, as tutor to one of his pupils, and at Leyden he applied himself to anatomy, and physic, and took his medical degrees. On his return to London he became physician to the London dispensary. He preached the funeral sermon of John Wesley, and published an account of his life, in 2 vols. 8vo. — but the work gave great offence to the methodists, and occasioned a quarrel. Dr. Whitehead died in London, 1804.

WHITEHURST, John, an eminent writer, born in 1713, at Congleton, Cheshire. He was brought up to the business of his father, a clock and watch maker, and after visiting Dublin, to see a curious clock, set up for himself at Derby. There he made the clock for the Town-hall, and also the clock and the chimes for All Saint's church; in 1775 he removed to London, where he became stamper of the money weights, by the patronage of the duke of Newcastle. Distinguished by his great mechanical knowledge, his house was the resort of the ingenious, and the scientific, and in reward for his valuable enquiries into the original state and formation of the earth, which he improved in 1787, in 1 vol. 4to. he was in 1779 elected member of the royal society. He published besides, an attempt towards obtaining invariable measures of length, capacity, and weight, from the mensuration of time, and contributed to the philosophical transactions three valuable papers, on thermometrical observations, at Derby, on a machine for raising water, and on an experiment on ignited substances. He prepared also a treatise on Chimnies, Ventilation, &c. which appeared after his death, by Dr. William. This ingenious and amiable man, died at his house in Bolt-court, Fleet street, 1788, aged 75.

WHITELOCK, sir James, an able lawyer, born in London, and educated at Merchant Taylors', and St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed in 1594, to the Middle Temple. He was chosen member for Woodstock, in 1620, and soon after made chief justice of Chester, and knighted. He was afterwards raised to the office of judge of the common pleas, and at last became chief justice of the king's bench, and died 1632, aged 62. He wrote Lectures or Readings in the Middle Temple hall — Speeches in Parliament, &c. He was well acquainted with Hebrew, and Greek, and so fluent a Latin speaker, that at the assizes at Oxford, he explained from the bench, to some dignified foreigners who were present, the charge which he had delivered to the jury, in good and elegant Latin.

WHITELOCK, Bulstrode, son of the above was born 6th Aug. 1605, in Fleet-street, London. He was educated at Merchant Taylors', and at St. John's, Oxford, which he left without a degree, to enter at the Middle Temple. Under the direction of his father, he acquired great knowledge of the law, and in the long parliament he was elected member for Marlow. Though he was one of the most active managers in the accusation against Strafford, he honorably declined to engage in the prosecution of Laud, from whom he had, when at Oxford, received many marks of kindness and hospitality. His influence was such in parliament, that he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat about peace with the king, and he also sat as a lay member in the Westminster assembly of divines. He afterwards gained gained the confidence of Cromwell, by informing him secretly of the intentions of lord Essex, to criminate him, but though one of the commissioners of the great seal, he refused to be concerned in the trial of the unfortunate Charles, and retired into the country. In 1648, he was elected high steward of Oxford, and he deserved the thanks of the university for the interference of his authority to preserve their library, and to protect their immunities. In 1653 he went ambassador to Sweden, and on his return, the next year, became commissioner of the Exchequer, and in 1656, he was chosen speaker of the commons, and the following year called up to the other house as one of Cromwell's lords. In 1659 he was appointed president of the council of state, and keeper of the great seal, but on the approach of the restoration he withdrew to the country, and led the rest of his life in retirement at Chilton, Wiltshire, where he died 28th Jan. 1676. He wrote memorials of the English affairs, or account of what passed during the reign of Charles I. till the restoration, &c. published 1682, and again edited 1732 — Memorials of the English affairs, from the time of Brutus, to the end of the first James' reign, published fol. 1709. — Monarchy asserted to be the best, most ancient, and legal form of government, 8vo. — Speeches in Rushworth's collection, &c. Though a confidential friend of Cromwell, he is deservedly commended by lord Clarendon, for his eminent parts, great learning, and the openness of his character.

WHITGIFT, John, a learned prelate, born 1530, at Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, from a family anciently settled at Whitgift in Yorkshire. He was educated at St. Anthony's school, London, and there he miraculously escaped the plague, and in 1548 he entered at Queen's college, Cambridge, from which he soon after removed to Pembroke hall. In 1555 he was chosen fellow of Peter-house, and when in orders he obtained from bishop Coxe, to whom he was chaplain, the rectory of Feversham in Cambridgeshire. He was in 1563 appointed Margaret professor of divinity, and two years after made chaplain to the queen. In 1567 he was made master of Pembroke-hall, and three months after placed at the head of Trinity college, and made regius professor of divinity. He was in 1573 made dean of Lincoln, and in 1576, raised to the see of Worcester, by Elizabeth who highly esteemed him, and in 1583, he was translated on the death of Grindal to Canterbury. In this elevated situation, he acted with great vigor against the puritans and papists, but though ridiculed by his enemies, he maintained his dignity and the moderation of his conduct, so that he is deservedly called by Fuller the worthiest man that ever the English hierarchy did enjoy. He died 29th Feb. 1604, at Croydon, where he had founded an hospital, and was buried in the parish church there, where a monument is erected to his memory. In his thesis for his doctor's degree, he maintained that the pope was antichrist. He wrote an answer to an admonition to the parliament 1572, which produced a long controversy between him and the puritans.

WHITTINGHAM, William, a native of Chester, educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was afterwards fellow of All Souls, and then student of Christ church, but he quitted England during Mary's bloody reign. Under Elizabeth he was made dean of Durham, though he entertained scruples against the liturgy and the church ceremonies established by parliament. He gave great offence to the Durham clergy by violating the stone coffins, and removing some of the ancient ornaments of his cathedral. He translated the Geneva bible into English, and also turned into metre some of the psalms of David, which appear in the old versions with the initials of his name. He died 1579.

WHITTINGTON, Robert, a native of Lichfield, who obtained a degree at Oxford by petitioning the congregation of regents, and declaring that he had spent 14 years in the study of rhetoric, and 12 years in teaching boys. He edited Lily's grammar, and published some school books of great utility. He was in his character an ill natured restless man, of whom it might be said that his hand was against every man, and every man's hand against him. He died about 1560.

WHITTINGTON, for Richard, a mercer and citizen of London in the times of Richard II. and his two successors. He was a man of great influence and very rich, and among other charitable labors he founded an alms house for 13 poor men, he built Newgate, the best part of Bartholomew's hospital, the library in Grey-friars, now called Christ's hospital, and part of Guildhall, with a chapel and library for the preservation of city records. He was sheriff for the city 1393, and was knighted, and afterwards served the office of lord mayor three times, the last time in 1419. The various stories which are reported of him are calculated for the amusement of children, but have no foundation in truth.

WICKAM, William, Vid. Wykeham.

WICKLIFFE, John de, a celebrated doctor, professor of divinity at Oxford, and deservedly considered as the forerunner of Luther in the reformation. He was born at Wickliffe in Yorkshire about 1324, and educated at Queen's college, and afterwards at Merton, and in 1361 raised to the mastership of Baliol college. In 1365 he was made, by the scholars, head of Canterbury hall, just founded at Oxford by archbishop Islip, but his elevation was opposed by the monks, and Langham the next primate, and the pope to whom the dispute was referred displaced him, and his secular associates. Thus disgraced by violence he retired to his living at Lutterworth in Leicestershire, meditating revenge against the authors of his unjust privation. In the works of Marsilius of Padua, and other bold writers, he found ample room to indulge his opposition, and well aware of the popularity of attacking a foreign power, which over-awed the throne, and submitted the industry and the revenues of the kingdom to its own avaricious views, he loudly inveighed against the errors and the encroachments of the Romish church. His writings alarmed the clergy, and a council was assembled at Lambeth, by archbishop Sudbury 1377, and Wickliffe summoned to give an account of his doctrines. He appeared before it, accompanied by the duke of Lancaster, then in power, and he made so able a defence, that he was dismissed without condemnation.

His

His acquittal, however, displeased the pope, Gregory XI. who directed his emissaries to seize the offending heretic, or if he were protected by the great and powerful of the kingdom, to cite him to Rome, to answer in person before the sovereign pontiff. In consequence of this a second council assembled at Lambeth, and the 19 propositions which the pope had declared heretical, were so ably vindicated by the eloquence of the undaunted reformer, that his judges, afraid of offending the nobles, or of exciting a commotion among the people, who loudly supported the cause of their champion, permitted him to depart in safety, and enjoined him silence in matters of religion and of controversy. Undismayed by the power of his enemies, Wickliffe continued to preach his doctrines, which were now more universally spread, and a third council, therefore, assembled under Courtenay the primate, 1382, and 24 propositions of the reformer were condemned as heretical, and 14 as erroneous. The severity of the church was, at the suggestion of the pope, and the concurrence of the weak Richard II. directed with effect against the supporters of the new heresy; but, whilst some of his followers suffered punishment for their adherence to his principles, Wickliffe unhappily died at Lutterworth 1384, at a time when nothing was wanting to emancipate the English nation from the tyranny of Rome, but the boldness, perseverance, and eloquence of a popular leader. Of the several works which he wrote, his Triologus is almost the only one which has been printed. The noble struggle which Wickliffe had made against the gigantic power of Rome was almost forgotten after his death, till Martin Luther arose to follow his steps, and to establish his doctrines on a foundation which will last till Christianity is no more. The memory of Wickliffe was branded with ignominy by the impotent papists, and by the order of the council of Constance, whose cruelties towards John of Huss, and Jerome of Prague are so well known, the illustrious reformer was declared to have died an obstinate heretic, and his bones were therefore dug up from holy ground, and contemptuously thrown on a dung-hill. The English translation of the New Testament, by the pen of Wickliffe, was published in folio by Lewis, and his life has been written among others by Gilpin.

WICQUEFORT, Abraham, a native of Amsterdam, who early settled in France, where he acquired great political knowledge. He became known to the elector of Brandenburg, who appointed him, in 1626, his ambassador at the court of France, where he continued his honorable services for 32 years. The jealousy of Mazarine at last produced his disgrace, and, upon an accusation of sending private intelligence of the state secrets of France to the Dutch government, he was sent to the bastille, and after some months' confinement, was conducted out of the kingdom. From Calais he passed over to England, and afterwards to Holland, where he was honorably received by De Witt, and appointed historiographer to the states. He was accused, in 1675, of holding secret correspondence with the enemies of the state, and in consequence of this he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment; but four years after he escaped, by the assistance of one of his daughters, who, at the peril of her life, exchanged clothes with him. He retired to Zell, which he quit- ted in disgust in 1681, because the duke refused to interest himself in procuring the reversion of his sentence at the Hague, and he died the next year. He wrote the History of the United Provinces from their establishment to the peace of Munster, fol. — the Ambassador and his Functions, 2 vols. 4to. — Memoirs on Ambassadors and public Ministers, &c.

WIDA, Herman de, a German divine, who joined his labors with those of Luther, Melancthon, and Bucer in effecting the reformation. He was made archbishop of Cologne in 1515; but was obliged to resign 1547, and died 1552. His opinions of church government were the nearest, of all the German reformers, to the doctrines of the church of England.

WILD, Henry, a taylor, born at Norwich. Though well educated, the poverty of his parents obliged him to seek for maintenance in a taylor's shop, and after working there 14 years, he at last emerged from obscurity, and by astonishing application not only regained his classical knowledge, but formed an intimate acquaintance with the Hebrew, and other oriental languages. He was by accident noticed by Dr. Prideaux, who liberally patronized him, and obtained for him permission of admittance into the Bodleian library at Oxford. At the university he maintained himself by teaching the oriental languages to private pupils, and in 1720 he removed to London, where he was admitted to the patronage and friendship of Dr. Mead. He died about 1733, respected as a sober, modest, diffident, and inoffensive man. After his death appeared his translation of Mahomet's Journey to Heaven, from the Arabic.

WILD, Robert, D.D. author of the tragedy of Christopher Love — Iter Boreale, a poem on the imprisonment of Calamy in Newgate — other poems, sermons, &c. was rector of Aynho, Northamptonshire, from which he was ejected at the restoration for nonconformity. He died at Oundle 1679.

WILDBORE, Charles, an eminent mathematician, who obtained the living of Broughton Sulney, Nottinghamshire, where he died 1803. His knowledge of mathematics, and of the classics was extensive, and all acquired by his own industry, and without the assistance of others. In 1759 he began his ingenious contributions to the Gentleman's Diary, and became the editor of it in 1780. He also contributed to the Ladies' Diary, and to Martin's Miscellaneous Correspondence, and he engaged, in 1773, in a controversy in Hutton's Miscellanea Mathematica, and also with Dawson of Sedbryk, about the velocity with which water issues from a vessel in motion.

WILDE, William, an English lawyer of eminence. He was recorder of London, created a baronet 1660, made king's serjeant, and one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and four years after, 1672, promoted to the King's bench. He published Yelverton's Reports, and died Nov. 23d, 1679.

WILDMAN, John, an able writer in the service of Oliver Cromwell. He was major in the army, and like the fanatics of the day, he spent much time in hypoetical prayers, and all the assumed sanctity of religion. He was imprisoned by Cromwell; but when his execution was expected, he was set at liberty, and afterwards served the usurper with great zeal, and by his pen, as well as his negotiations, contributed much to the popularity of his government.

WILKES, Thomas, an Augustine monk, of Osney abbey, near Oxford, author of an History of England from William I. to the end of the first Edward's reign. He wrote also some Latin tracts, &c.

WILKES, John, alderman and chamberlain of London, was born 28th Oct. 1727, in St. John's-street, Clerkenwell, the son of a distiller. He received his education at Hertford school, and under a private tutor, and then went to Leyden, and on his return to England, he married, about 1750, Miss Mead, of the Meads of Buckinghamshire. In 1754 he stood an unsuccessful candidate for Berwick, but three years after was elected for Aylesbury. He first drew upon himself the severity of government in 1763 by the publication of the 45th number of the North Briton, and in consequence of this offensive paper, he was sent to the Tower. Though the warrant by which he had been arrested was declared illegal, he was dismissed from the office of colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia, and his opposition to government marked him as a dangerous innovator, and as an object of persecution. The republication of the North Briton was followed by his Essay on Woman, an indelicate and licentious performance, for which he was properly arraigned in the court of King's Bench, and upon conviction expelled from the House of Commons, and outlawed. He afterwards obtained a verdict against Mr. Wood, the under secretary of state, with 1000*l.* damages, and soon after retired from his persecutors to Paris. On his return to England in 1768, he sent a letter of submission to the king, and at the general election, offered himself a candidate for London, but though unsuccessful, he was soon after chosen for Middlesex. His election was declared void by the House of Commons; but his constituents persisted in their choice, and after he had been thus arbitrarily expelled the house three times, Mr. Luttrell, his antagonist, who had but few votes, was declared the successful candidate. In 1769 he was elected alderman of Farringdon Without, and the same year he obtained a verdict against lord Halifax, the secretary of state, for seizing his papers, with 4000*l.* damages. In 1771 he served the office of sheriff, and in 1774 was elected lord mayor, and was permitted quietly to take his seat in the House of Commons for Middlesex. In 1779 he obtained the lucrative office of chamberlain to the city of London, and then gave himself up to the duties of his appointment, regardless of the political struggles in which he had so long been engaged. In his retirement at his seat in the Isle of Wight, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, and convivial society. He died 26th Dec. 1797, aged 70, and was buried in a vault in Grosvenor chapel, South Audley-street. Besides the works already mentioned, he published several political pamphlets and speeches, occasioned by the occurrences of the times, and he also gave to the world splendid editions of Theophrastus and of Catullus, and prepared an elegant translation of Anacreon. Though for a number of years the idol of the people, and the champion of opposition, Wilkes sunk into obscurity in the latter part of life; and he, who once compared himself to Brutus, and fought for public favor, and for popularity in opposing the measures of government, and in abusing the monarchy, was at last seen a bending courtier at the levees at St. James's, and the associate of those political dependants with whom to have familiarly conversed some years before he would have considered as the highest of disgrace. In his private character he was licentious; his conversation was easy and full of wit, his manners were pleasing and elegant, though his physiognomy was in the highest degree forbidding; and his memory was so strongly retentive, that his company was a perpetual treat of facetiousness and of amusement to the chosen few whom he selected for his intimate friends. He was a man of great personal courage; he fought several duels in support of his political character; and the firmness with which he exerted himself during the dreadful riots of 1780, was so conspicuous, so spirited, and so salutary to the bank and to the city, that he received for his extraordinary services, the thanks of the privy council.

WILKIE, William, D. D. a native of West Lothian, educated at Edinburgh. He became professor of natural philosophy at St. Andrew's, where he died 1772. He was distinguished not only as an able divine, but as an ingenious poet, author of the Epigoniad, and some fables, 8vo.

WILKINS, John, an ingenious prelate, son of a citizen of Oxford, was born 1614 at Fawley, near Daventry, Northamptonshire, at the house of his mother's father, Mr. Dod, a well known dissenter. He was educated at a private school in Oxford, and then entered in 1627 at New Inn hall, from which he soon removed to Magdalen hall, where he took his degrees. He became chaplain to lord Say, and then to Charles, count palatine of the Rhine, and on the breaking out of the civil wars, he joined the parliament, and took the solemn league and covenant. He was next appointed warden of Wadham college, and one of the reformers of the university, and in 1656 he married Robina, the widow of Peter French, canon of Christchurch, sister to Oliver Cromwell, and by means of this alliance he obtained a dispensation to keep the headship of his college against the statutes which required celibacy. In 1659 he was made master of Trinity college, Cambridge, by Richard Cromwell; but he was ejected at the restoration, and then became preacher to the Gray's inn society, and rector of St. Lawrence Jewry, London. He was afterwards member of the Royal society, and one of their most active council, and he next was made dean of Rippon, and in 1668 promoted, by the interest of Villiers, to the see of Chester. He did not long enjoy his preferment, but died of the stone, 19th Nov. 1672, at the house of Dr. Tillotson, his son-in-law, in Chancery-lane, London. He was buried in the chancel of St. Lawrence Jewry, and his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Lloyd, dean of Bangor. Though much abused by party for his connection with the family of the usurper, er, he was a man of great abilities, an able theologian, an acute mathematician, and an active promoter of experimental philosophy. To his intimacy with Cromwell, Oxford was indebted, if not for many favors, at least for that deliverance from pillage and violence which the puritans at that time exercised against every place eminent for learning or loyalty. The writings of Dr. Wilkins are curious, learned, and interesting. In 1638 he published the Discovery of a New World, or a Discourse to prove that the Moon is Habitable, with a Discourse on the Possibility of a Passage to it. His Discourse concerning a New Planet, to prove that our Earth is a New Planet, appeared in 1640 — his Mercury 1641 — Mathematical Magic, or the Wonders that may be performed by Mechanical Geometry, 1648 — all which were republished in 1708 in 8vo. He wrote besides, Ecclesiastes, or Discourse on the Gift of Preaching — Discourses on the Gift of Prayer — sermons — of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion, &c.

WILKINS, David, D. D. F. A. S. keeper of the archbishop's library at Lambeth, was rewarded by Wake the primate, for the curious catalogue which he made of all the books and MSS. of that valuable collection 1718, with several benefices, a prebend in Canterbury church, and the archdeaconry of Suffolk. He published the New Testament in Coptic — the Saxon Laws, &c. — an edition of Selden's works, 3 vols. fol. — Pentateuch Coptic, &c. and died 6th Aug. 1740, aged 62.

WILKINSON, Henry, of the assembly of Westminster divines, rector of St. Dunstan's in the East, canon of Christ church, and Margaret professor of divinity at Oxford, was ejected from his ecclesiastical honors at the restoration for nonconformity, and died 1675. He was author of some sermons, &c.

WILKINSON, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, of which he became principal. During the civil wars he espoused the popular cause, and was appointed professor of moral philosophy, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He published some English sermons, the doctrine of contentment, &c. several Latin tracts, &c. His Prælectiones Morales, remain in MSS. in the library of his college. He died at Great Connard near Sudbury, Suffolk, 13th May, 1690, aged 74.

WILLEMET, Remi Peter Francis, a physician, born at Nancy, 2d April, 1762. He studied medicine under his father, and then went to the East Indies, and became first physician to Tippoo Saib, and died at Seringapatam 1790. He wrote some Latin dissertations on physiology, &c. and his Herbarium Mauritanum, was published at Leipzig in 1796, 8vo.

WILLIAM I. king of England, surnamed the Conqueror, was natural son of Robert I. duke of Normandy by Arlotta, daughter of a furrier of Falaise, where he was born 1024. He was put in possession of the dukedom of Normandy by his father, and on the death of Edward the Confessor, king of England, he laid claim to the sovereignty of that kingdom, to which he pretended to be entitled under the will of the late monarch. He landed on the English shores Sep. 1066, and burning his fleet encouraged his foldiers by pointing to the land and exclaiming, behold your country! He was quickly met by Harold, whom the people had fixed on the throne, but the battle of Hastings soon decided the fate of the kingdom, and the fall of Harold and of his two brothers with 50,000 English left him master of the country. William advanced to London, where he was crowned on Christmas day 1066, and deservedly obtained the surname of Conqueror, but while he expected submission and peace he found insurrection and hostility on all sides. By dividing the lands of the nobility among his followers he created himself thousands of enemies, and the people whom he oppressed by the severity of his laws, answered the rigor of his government by discontent and rebellion. To silence their clamors and prevent their seditious meetings he ordered a bell or Curfew to be rung every evening at eight o'clock, to warn the people to put out their light, and this severe regulation, though common on the continent, was regarded by the English as the height of wanton tyranny. As if determined to change the manners of his subjects he ordered that all pleadings should be made in his courts in the French language, but though this was observed as far as the reign of the third Edward, the national idiom prevailed, and the English though conquered still retained their language, their manners, and their prejudices. Notwithstanding these arbitrary steps, William showed himself attentive to the interests and prosperity of his people, and an accurate survey was made by his order of all the lands and property of the kingdom and registered in Doomsday book, which is still preserved. Various castles were also raised in convenient places, the Tower of London was finished 1078, and at last security and protection were ensured to the subject, by the firmness of the government, and the prompt administration of the laws. Instead of a conqueror William at last was regarded as the friend of his people; and he crossed over to the continent with an army of English, to reduce to obedience his revolted dukedom of Normandy. The king of France had excited the sons of the English prince to disobedience, and William hastened to punish his insidious designs, as well as the severe jests with which he had ridiculed his great corpulency. His expedition proved fatal to himself, he fell from his horse in leaping a ditch near Mantes, and died in consequence of it, a few days after at Rouen, 10th Sep. 1087, aged 63. He was buried in the church which he had built at Caen. William as a monarch was a respectable character, and if he had endeavoured with greater assiduity to conciliate the affections of the people whom he had conquered, he might have been a great prince, and in more firmly securing his own tranquillity in the government, contributed most essentially to the happiness and prosperity of England. By Matilda, daughter of the count of Flanders he left three sons, Robert duke of Normandy, and William and Henry, who both succeeded to the English crown.

WILLIAM II. king of England, surnamed Rufus from the color of his hair, succeeded his father William in the absence of his elder brother, and was crowned 27th Sep. 1087. Though he made the fairest promises for the protection of the clergy, and for the happiness of the people, he became a capricious persecutor of the one, and a cruel oppressor of the other. He banished Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury, who reprehended him for his conduct, and he obtained the dukedom of Normandy through the imprudence of his brother. He also invaded Wales and conquered the Scotch, and used the power which success in war and negotiations ensured in gratifying his avarice, and in oppressing his people. He was shot accidentally as he was hunting in the New Forest in Hampshire, by a dart from the hand of Walter Tyrrell, one of his courtiers, and he died a few hours after, 2d Aug. 1100, aged 44.

WILLIAM III. of Nassau, prince of Orange, and king of England, was born at the Hague 14th Nov. 1650, of William prince of Orange, and Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I. He was elected Stadtholder in 1672, and named general of the Dutch forces against Lewis XIV. and he carried to the war a soul ambitious of glory, the most determined courage, and a phlegmatic indifference to pleasure and to luxury which exhibited him unshaken in adversity, and heroic in the midst of his greatest successes. Though brave and vigilant he was defeated in 1674 at Senef, by the prince of Condé, and in 1677 he was obliged to raise the siege of Charleroi, but the peace of Nimeguen the next year put an end to the quarrels of the continent. The unpopular measures of his father-in-law James II. of England, excited in 1688 his highest ambition, and yielding to the wishes of the British nation he landed with a small force at Brixham, 4th Nov. the same year, and after a few skirmishes soon dispossessed the monarch of his throne. Thus in conjunction with his wife Mary, he was acknowledged king of England, and was crowned 11th April, 1689, but though hailed as a deliverer and a friend by the English, Ireland still remained attached to the fortunes of the fugitive James. William with his usual activity crossed to Ireland, and there met with his father-in-law who had landed from France, supported by a French force. The battle of the Boyne proved fatal to the affairs of James who retired in dismay to France, and left his rival in peaceful possession of the throne. The war which had raged in Ireland was removed to the continent, and by his powerful alliances William determined to punish the duplicity of the French king who had excited distrust and rebellion in his kingdom. Though checked at Steinkerque and Nerwinde, William headed the allied forces to victory, Namur was taken, and greater conquests were promised to the English nation when the peace of Ryfwick was signed, and the right of William to the British throne was acknowledged by Lewis. Always active, and jealously hostile against the power of France, William was making new preparations to curb the ambition of his rival, and to arm the powers of the continent in favor of his plans, when death stopped his career. He fell from his horse while riding near Hampton-court, and broke his collar bone, and though the accident in a more robust constitution might have been deemed trivial, it proved fatal in William, and a slow fever carried him off, 16th March, 1702, in his 53d year. William left behind him the character of a great politician, though he had never been popular, and of a formidable general though he was seldom victorious. In his manners he was cold and reserved, fullen and phlegmatic, and showed little animation, except in the moment of battle. He despised flattery, yet was ambitious of power. Greater as the general of Holland, than as the king of England, he was to the one a father, and to the other a suspicious friend. Disgusted with the jealous politics of England, he at one time resolved to abandon the government, when obliged by the parliament to dismiss his Dutch guards, and while he regarded the leaders of opposition as factious demagogues, he did not hesitate to ensure the success of his measures by the mean and dangerous engines of bribery and of corruption. While in his retirement in Holland, far from the cabals of English politics, he devoted himself to increase the enemies of Lewis XIV. he did not scruple to render the power and the resources of England subservient to the ambitious schemes of the Stadtholder of Holland, and in guiding the interested plans of a league against France, he laid the foundation of that system of continental alliances which if it has yielded to the kingdom barren glory, has entailed upon it poverty, discontent, and wretchedness.

WILLIAM, son of Florent IV. count of Holland, and Matilda of Brabant, was crowned king of the Romans, after the death of Henry of Thuringia 1247. Though opposed by powerful factions, he showed himself active and vigilant, and at last was assassinated by some peasants, whilst in a marsh, from which his horse was unable to extricate him, 1255.

WILLIAM, St. son of count of Thierry, and duke of Aquitaine, after distinguishing himself, by his valor against the Saracens, in the service of Charlemagne, bade adieu to the world, and retired to a monastery. He died there 28th May 812.

WILLIAM LONGSWORD, son and successor of Rollo, first duke of Normandy, was an able and active general. He defeated the Bretons, and increased his dominions, by the addition of Avranches and Cotentin. He was basely murdered in 942, at Pequiny-sur-Somme, where he had been invited, to hold a conference by a neighbouring chief.

WILLIAM DE NANGIUS, a monkish historian, of St. Denys. He was author of two Chronicles, one from the Creation to his own time 1301, continued by two monks of his abbey to 1368, and the other of the kings of France, &c.

WILLIAMS, Charles Hanbury, second son of I. Hanbury, a south-sea director, was member for Monmouth, in several parliaments, and in 1744, was installed knight of the bath, and two years sent as minister to the Prussian court. He was afterwards ambassador to Russia, and died 2d Nov. 1759. He was author of some poems remarkable for their ease and vivacity, rather than for their moral tendency or elegance of composition. They have appeared in Doddsley's collection, and other periodical works.

WILLIAMS, John, an eminent prelate, born 25th March 1582, at Aber-conway, Caernarvonshire. From Ruthin school, he removed, at the age of 16, to St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. His

His application to literature was unusually great, and as he required only three hours of sleep in the 24, to recruit his constitution, his improvement in divinity, in philosophy, and in every branch of literature was rapid, and lasting. He obtained in 1611, the rectory of Grafton Regis, in Northamptonshire, and the next year that of Grafton Underwood, in the same county, to which were soon after added prebends in Lincoln, Hereford, St. David's, and Peterborough cathedrals. On the death of Egerton the chancellor, to whom he was chaplain, he obtained as a legacy, all his MS. papers, and thus derived important information, which afterwards guided his conduct in parliament, and in chancery. His abilities recommended him to the king, who made him his chaplain, and in 1619, gave him the deanery of Salisbury, and the next year that of Westminster. On the removal of Bacon, from the office of chancellor in 1621, Williams was entrusted with the seals, and a few days after appointed bishop of Lincoln. He attended the king in his last illness, and preached his funeral sermon, in which he compared him for wisdom and intelligence to Solomon. The influence of Buckingham however proved too great for him, and he was not only removed from the seals, but accused in the star-chamber, and by the contrivance of Laud fined 10,000*l.* and stripped of all his ecclesiastical dignities, and imprisoned in the tower. After a confinement of nearly four years, he was set at liberty, by the interference of the house of lords, and was reconciled to the king. In the impeachment of Strafford, he, according to Clarendon, asserted the impropriety of the bishops voting in a case of blood, and afterwards when consulted by the king, he advised him to sacrifice that unfortunate nobleman to the fury of his enemies, if perhaps he thus might produce a reconciliation between himself and the people. In 1641, he was raised to the see of York, and ably opposed the bill for depriving the bishops of their seats in the house of lords. When however he protested with the other prelates on the irregularity of the peers proceeding in the public business, whilst the bishops were absent, in consequence of the threats of the mob, he was sent to the Tower as guilty of high treason. During the civil war, he yielded to the storm, and retired to his native town, where he fortified and for some time ably defended Conway castle. The death of the king overwhelmed him with sorrow, and he felt the blow with such poignancy of grief, that he constantly rose every night, at midnight, and passed a quarter of an hour in deep and solemn prayer. He died soon after, 25th Mar. 1650, and was buried in Llandegay church, where a monument was erected to his memory by his nephew, sir Griffith Williams. He was author of some sermons — of the Holy Table, &c. — against Laud's Innovations, a book commended by lord Clarendon. Though accused by some of pride and ambition, archbishop Williams possessed great virtues, he was charitable and humane, the friend of learning and of merit, and in his conduct hospitable and courteous. His life has been written by Hacket his chaplain.

WILLIAMS, Anna, a lady of literary character, daughter of a surgeon in Wales. Her father, with more warmth than prudence, persuaded himself that he had discovered the longitude by magnetism, and with this idea full of golden dreams, he hastened to London in 1730, but saw all his hopes vanish in disappointment, and, in the midst of his distress he was fortunate enough to obtain the place of a pensioner in the Charter-house. His daughter who accompanied him, contributed all the powers of her mind to support his indigence, but in 1740 she was afflicted with a cataract, which totally deprived her of sight. In this distressful situation, she still engaged herself in the exercise of her needle for the maintenance of her indigent father, who had quitted the Charter-house, and in 1746, she added a little to her scanty income by publishing the life of the emperor Julian, from the French of la Bleterie. The distresses of the father, and the virtuous industry of the daughter, soon after became known to Dr. Johnson and his wife, and commiseration at last ended in the closest intimacy. Miss Williams was admitted into the house of the great moralist, and after the death of his wife, whose bed of sickness she soothed with all the kind offices of friendship, she still continued under the protection of her excellent host. An operation was performed upon her eyes, by Mr. Sharp, but it proved unsuccessful; yet in the midst of her sufferings, she found comfort, not only in the treatment of Dr. Johnson, but in the kindness of Garrick, who in 1755, granted her a benefit, which produced for her the clear sum of 200*l.* The latter part of her life was rendered still more comfortable by the publication of her Miscellanies in prose and verse, 1765, which added more than 100*l.* to her little fortune, and thus tended to spread cheerfulness, and independence around the infirmities of declining age and of melancholy blindness. She died 6th Sept. 1783, aged 77, in the house of her friend Dr. Johnson, in Bolt-court, Fleet-street, and left her little property for the charitable education of poor deserted girls.

WILLIAMS, John, an able divine, born in Northamptonshire. He entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, 1651, where he took his degrees, and afterwards obtained the rectory of St. Mildred in the Poultry, and Rugmere prebend in St. Paul's cathedral. After the revolution he became chaplain to the king, prebendary of Canterbury, and in 1696 he was raised to the see of Chichester. He was author of several controversial tracts against the papists and dissenters — and of the Characters of Divine Revelation, in sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures. He died 1709.

WILLIAMS, Daniel, a native of Wrexham in Denbighshire. When in orders he settled in Ireland as chaplain to lady Meath, and was for 20 years an active minister in Dublin; but on the breaking out of the troubles in 1687 he came to London, and succeeded Mr. Baxter at the merchants' lecture, Pinner's hall. He was created D. D. in 1709, by the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and died 26th Jan. 1716, aged 72. His Practical Discourses appeared in 2 vols. 1738, with his life prefixed. He founded a library in Redcross-street for the use of dissenting ministers.

WILLIS, Thomas, an eminent physician, born at Great Bedwin, Wiltshire, 1621. He was educated at a private school at Oxford, and then entered at Christ-church, where he took his degrees in arts and medicine. When Oxford was garrisoned by the king, he took up arms in the royal cause, and after the surrender, he returned to the studies and practice of his profession. In 1660 he was appointed Sedleian professor of natural philosophy, and increased his reputation and his fortune by an extensive and respectable practice. He was one of the first members of the Royal society, and became fellow of the college of physicians. In 1666 he removed to London, and soon rose to the height of his profession in the city. He died at his house in St. Martin's-lane, 11th Nov. 1675, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote several works on the different branches of his profession, often reprinted, especially at Geneva, 2 vols. 4to. 1676, and Amsterdam, 1682. Though accused by some of framing a body of physic, chiefly on hypotheses of his own, without having recourse to experiment and observation, he is regarded by others as a sagacious anatomist, an able philosopher, and a most learned and skilful physician, respectable for veracity, information, and integrity.

WILLIS, Browne, L.L. D. son of Thomas Willis, of Bletchey, Bucks, and grandson of the preceding, was born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 14th Sept. 1682. From Bechampton school he passed to Westminster, and at the age of 17 he was removed as gentleman commoner to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He afterwards retired to Fenny-Stratford, and in 1705 was elected member of parliament for Buckingham. In 1717 he became one of the members of the society of antiquaries just revived, and he showed such emulation in the pursuit of antiquities, that he visited all the cathedrals of England and Wales except Carlisle. Though he had a large family, he was a liberal contributor to the repairing of the church of Stoney Stratford, which had suffered by fire, and he gave, in 1741, to the university, his valuable cabinet of English coins, the laborious collection of upwards of 40 years. He liberally made other contributions to charitable purposes, and died at Whaddon hall, 5th Feb. 1760, and was buried at Fenny-Stratford. An account of his publications, with some interesting particulars, is inserted in the anecdotes of Bowyer by Nichols. The best known of his works are the Survey of the Cathedrals, 2 vols. 4to. — an Account of Mitred Abbeys, 2 vols. 8vo.

WILLOUGHBY, Francis, an eminent naturalist, born 1635. To the high advantages of birth, rank, and fortune, he added the more solid merit of application, and a strong attachment to literature. He directed the powers of his cultivated mind chiefly to the history of animals, and after reading every book which could elucidate the subject, he travelled over his native country, and afterwards visited France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, accompanied by his intelligent friend Ray. The observations made in these journeys on animals and on nature, were carefully preserved, but before they could be submitted to the public eye, the learned author died, universally and deservedly respected, 3d July 1672, aged only 37. He left Mr. Ray the guardian of his children, and was buried with his ancestors in Middleton church, Warwickshire. His works were afterwards published by his friend Ray, and were Ornithologiae Libri tres, &c. with cuts, folio, translated into English by the editor — Historiæ Piscium Libri quatuor, &c. with cuts, folio — Letters, with Observations on Wasps called Ichneumones, &c. — Letters, &c. inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. He was an active member of the Royal society.

WILSON, Arthur, a native of Yarmouth, Norfolk. He was some time clerk in the exchequer office, under sir Henry Spillar, and in 1614 entered into the service of Robert, earl of Essex, whom he attended into the Palatine, in Holland, and at the siege of Cadiz. In 1630 he was dismissed from the confidence of Essex by the intrigues of lady Essex, who had conceived an aversion against him, and the next year he entered as gentleman commoner at Trinity college, Oxford. He afterwards was in the retinue of lord Warwick, and died at Felstead in Essex, 1652, aged 56. He wrote some comedies according to Wood, who speaks of him with some degree of commendation, and also the Life and Reign of king James I. printed 1653, folio. This work is censured by most historians as written not without prejudice and rancor, and in language harsh and obscure.

WILSON, Thomas, a learned prelate, born at Burton Wirral, Cheshire, Dec. 1663. From a private school at Chester he removed to Trinity college, Dublin, where he studied medicine, which he soon abandoned for divinity. He was ordained in 1686, and soon after became curate of New church in the parish of Winwick, Lancashire, where he formed an acquaintance with lord Derby, who appointed him his chaplain, and tutor to his son, lord Strange. He refused the rectory of Baddesworth in Yorkshire, because he was incapable of residence upon it, and when offered by the kindness of his patron the bishopric of Sodor and Man, which had been already vacant for three years, he declined the honor, but at last in compliance with the repeated requests of his friends, he accepted it in 1696. He was created L.L. D. by archbishop Tenison, and consecrated by his primate Sharp, in the Savoy church, and in 1698 he first visited his diocese. Though his revenues were only 300l. a-year, they were sufficient to support him with dignity, and to contribute to the comforts of the poor and the helpless. With the most laudable zeal he built a new chapel at Castleton, and he founded parochial libraries through the island, and in 1703, obtained the act of settlement, and the passing into a law of his ecclesiastical constitutions, which were so highly applauded by lord chancellor King, that he declared if the ancient discipline of the church were lost in England, it could be recovered in all its purity in the isle of Man. In respect to his virtues and his services, he was in 1707, created D. D. at both the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. In 1721 he was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with the governor of the island, in consequence of his forbidding the introduction of the Independent Whig, an obnoxious book, into his diocese, and this dispute was more seriously increased the following year.

year. The bishop suspended one of his clergy for administering the sacrament to a person whom he had banished for ill conduct from the holy table, and the governor enlisting on the side of the offended party, fined the prelate, and committed him to prison, where he refused to discharge the fine. The tumults which consequently were excited among the people, were appeased by the mild exhortations of the bishop from the walls of his prison, and after a confinement of nine weeks, he was set at liberty by the direction of the privy council, who reversed all the proceedings of the governor against him. So high an insult called aloud for punishment, but the benevolent prelate checked the importunities of his friends who wished him to prosecute the governor. This venerable man was so attached to his situation that he refused an English bishopric, and gradually sunk under the infirmities of age. He expired gently 7th March, 1755, in the 93d year of his age, and the 58th of his consecration. By his wife, Mary Patten, of Warrington, whom he married at Winwick 1698, and who died 1705, he had two sons and two daughters all of whom died young except Thomas the youngest. In 1699 he published the Principles and Duties of Christianity, for the use of the island, in Manks, the first book ever printed in that language. His works were 2 vols. fol. consisting of religious tracts, and sermons, with a short history of the isle of Man. He also formed the plan for translating the bible into the Manks language which proceeded under him to the end of the Gospels but was finished by his successor Hiddesley. His sermons have since his death appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. and his bible with valuable notes in 3 vols. 4to.

WILSON, Thomas, son of the preceding, was born 24th Aug. 1703, and educated at Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degree of D. D. 1739. He became prebendary of Westminster, minister of St. Margaret's there, and rector of St. Stephen's Walbrook for 46 years. He opposed the building of a new square at Westminster, because his interest in the prebendal house was undervalued; and he rendered himself ridiculous by erecting to Mrs. Macaulay Graham a statue in his own church, under the character of Liberty. His fondness for the lady disappeared when she married against his consent, and the monument of his weakness was removed. Besides the Ornaments of Churches considered, &c. — a view of the Projected Improvements in Westminster, &c. — and Distilled Liquors, the Bane of the Nation, a popular pamphlet, which procured him the friendship of sir Joseph Jekyll, he published his father's works. He died at Bath 15th April, 1784, and was buried in Walbrook church.

WILSON, Florence, a native of Murray in Scotland, educated at King's college, Aberdeen. He travelled abroad, and resided for some time at Basil where he had Erasmus among the number of his friends. He afterwards taught philosophy in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he was universally respected for his learning and abilities. He returned to Scotland in 1554, and died at Elgin in retirement 1557, aged 57. He wrote de Tranquillitate Animæ, published by Frebairn 1706, and Ruddiman 1750.

WILSON, John, a native of Kendal, Westmoreland.

Though engaged in knitting stockings, he emerged from his humble occupation, and indulging his fondness for botanical pursuits, he became a popular lecturer in that science, and had numerous and applauding audiences at Kendal and Newcastle. He published a Synopsis of British Plants, in the manner of Ray, 1744, 8vo. and died about 1750.

WILSON, Richard, a native of Pineges in Montgomeryshire, educated under the care of his father who was the rector of the parish. He pursued his partiality for painting under a London artist, and in 1749 he visited Italy, where he was employed in landscape painting by Mr. Locke. He returned to England in 1755 and became member of the royal academy, and was appointed its librarian in 1779. From the superior execution of his landscapes he has been called the English Claude. He died 1782, aged 68.

WIMPINA, Conrad, a native of Buchan, professor of divinity at Frankfort, who warmly engaged in defence of the papal power against Luther, and the other reformers. His works appeared at Frankfort 1528, fol. and he died 1531.

WINCHELSEA, Anne, countess of, daughter of sir Richard Kingmill, of Hampshire, was maid of honor to the second wife of James II. and married Heneage afterwards earl of Winchelsea. She possessed great genius, and wrote a poem on the Spleen, printed in Gilden's miscellany 1701 — Aristomenes, a tragedy never acted, &c. Her poetical works, which are elegantly written, were published in 1713, 8vo. She died 5th Aug 1720, without issue.

WINCHESTER, Thomas, D. D. a native of Farringdon, Berkshire. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degree of D. D. 1749, and in 1761 he obtained from the society the living of Appleton, Berks, where he died 1780. He was author of a tract on the 17th article of the church of England, reprinted for the use of divinity-students in 1803, by the judicious care of Mr. Churton of Brazen-nose, who has prefixed an account of the writer. He wrote besides a tract against the Confessional, sermons, &c.

WINCHESTER, Elkanah, an American divine in the last century, author of a popular work in defence of the doctrine of universal salvation.

WINCKELMANN, John, a native of Homberg in Hesse, author of some polemical works, of Commentaries on the gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, and on the minor prophets, &c. He died 1626.

WINCKELMANN, Abbé John, a native of Stendall, in Brandenburg, born 1718. Though but the son of a shoe-maker, and for some time engaged in the same employment, he burst from his obscurity, and became, for seven years, professor of belles lettres at Sechausen. He afterwards went to Saxony, where he continued for seven more years librarian to count Bunau, at Nothenitz, and in 1754 went to Dresden, where he formed an acquaintance with the ablest artists. About this time he renounced the protestant faith for the Roman catholic tenets, and the next year went to Italy to visit the valuable contents of the Vatican, and the precious relics of Herculaneum. His celebrity here recommended him to the notice of the

the great and powerful, and as a most judicious antiquarian, and an enlightened connoisseur of the works of arts, he was universally courted at Rome. He became president of the antiquaries in the Vatican, member of the Royal and antiquarian societies of London, and of other learned societies in Europe. He was honorably invited to Dresden and to Berlin; but the liberality of the pope detained him at Rome, where, in the midst of the monuments collected from the treasures of ancient and modern times, he indulged his fondness for the productions of genius and of art. In 1768 he made a journey to Vienna, and was received with great kindness by the emperor; but on his return to Italy, while he stopped at Trieste, he was basely assassinated by Arcangeli, a man to whom he had imprudently shown at the inn the medals and the various presents with which he had been honored. This unfortunate catastrophe happened 8th June, 1768, and the murderer, who hoped to escape with the plunder, was seized, and executed on the wheel, opposite the inn where the crime had been perpetrated. The works of Winckelmann were, the History of Art among the Ancients, in German, translated into French, Italian, and English, 3 vols. 4to. — Reflections on the Imitation of the Works of the Greeks — Allegory for Artists — Explanations of difficult Parts of Mythology — Remarks on the Architecture of the Ancients — Familiar Letters, &c. He planned besides, various other works for the elucidation of the arts, of which his melancholy death prevented the completion. In his character he was impetuous and enthusiastic, ardent and authoritative in his decisions, and in his conversation so free and open, that he spoke his sentiments with boldness, and without reserve. He was the friend and the correspondent of the most learned men of his times, and he deserved their confidence by the sincerity of his conduct, and the generosity of his heart. His life has been published by Heyne.

WING, Vincent, author of the Celestial Harmony of the Visible World, 1667, fol. — of an Ephemeris for 30 Years — of Computatio Catholica — and of Astronomia Britannica, a work of merit, was well skilled in astrology, and died 20th Sept. 1661. A sheet almanack is still published under his name. An account of his life was published by Gadbury.

WINGATE, Edmund, author of the Use of the Rule of Proportion, or Gunter's Scale — of Natural and Artificial Arithmetic, 8vo. often reprinted — of Ludus Mathematicus — of the Exact Surveyor — of Tables of Logarithms, and other mathematical works, was a native of Bedfordshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and at Gray's Inn, London. He was for some time employed in the royal household, as English teacher to the first Charles's queen; but he forgot the favors of his sovereign during the civil wars, and taking the covenant, he became the friend of Cromwell, and served in his parliament. He died 1656, aged 63.

WINSCHOMB, John, better known by the name of Jack of Newbury, was the most opulent, and the largest clothier in the reign of Henry VIII. He built part of Newbury church, and was so loyal, that he armed, at his own expence, 100 men, whom he led in person against the Scots at the battle of Floddenfield, under the earl of Surrey. He kept in his house 100 looms, and his memory has been so affectionately respected by his fellow townsmen, that an inn at Newbury still bears his name.

WINSEMIUS, Peter, a native of Leeward, who, after travelling over Germany, Sweden, and France, became historiographer to the states of Holland, and professor of history and eloquence at Franeker, where he died 1644, aged 59. He wrote the History of Friesland, in Flemish, fol. — Vita Mauritii Principis Auriaci, &c. His brother Menelaus was professor of medicine at Franeker, and died there 15th May, 1639. He wrote Compendium Anatomiae, 4to.

WINSLOW, James Benignus, an eminent Danish anatomist, born at Odinsø, Denmark, 2d April, 1669. He was the grand nephew of the celebrated Steno. He went to Paris, where he studied under du Verney, and was converted to the catholic faith by Bossuet. He became physician of the faculty of Paris, demonstrator in the royal gardens, and member of the Paris academy of sciences. He wrote a tract on the Uncertainty of the Signs of Death, 2 vols. 12mo. — Anatomy with Improvements, 4to. — on the Diseases of the Bones, and other anatomical works. He died 3d April 1760, aged 91.

WINSTANLEY, William, author of the Lives of the Poets — of Select Lives of England's Worthies — of Historical Rarities — of the Loyal Martyrology — and some single lives, &c. all in 8vo. was originally a barber. His style is incorrect and vulgar, yet his compositions are valuable for noticing some facts which other writers have passed over in silence. He lived in the reigns of Charles II. and James II.

WINSTON, Thomas, an English physician, who studied at Clare-hall, Cambridge, and afterwards travelled over the continent. He passed some time in the academies of Basil, and also of Padua, where he took his medical degrees. On his return to England he took his degree of M. D. at Cambridge, and settled in London 1607, and became fellow of the college of physicians, and professor of physic at Gresham college. During the civil wars he retired to France, and after an absence of ten years came back, and died in London 24th Oct. 1655, aged 80. After his death his anatomical lectures appeared 8vo. 1659 and 1664.

WINTER, George Simon, a German writer in the 17th century. He paid great attention to the veterinary art, and published Tractatio Nova de Re Equaria, in Latin, French, and German, 1672, fol. — Eques Peritus et Hippiator Expertus.

WINTOWN, or WYNTOWN, Andrew, canon of St. Andrew's, and prior of St. Serfius in Loch Leven, was author of a Chronicle of Scotland, undertaken at the request of one of the ancestors of the earl of Wemyss. The work has lately been edited; it is written in rhyme, but though curious, contains much tradition and fable mixed with truth. He died about 1400.

WINTRINGHAM, sir Clifton, a native of York, educated at Cambridge. He became physician to the late duke of York, and settled in London, where he acquired acquired celebrity in his profession, and was raised to the honors of the baronetage. He published Mead's Medical Precepts improved, 8vo. and died in London, 1794, aged 84.

WINWOOD, sir Ralph, a native of Aynho, Northamptonshire, educated at St. John's college, Oxford, from which he removed in 1582 as probationer fellow to Magdalen. He was proctor of the university 1592, and afterwards travelled over Europe, and in 1599 went as secretary in sir H. Neville's embassy to France. He was in 1602 sent envoy to Holland, and in 1607 received the honor of knighthood. He again represented his sovereign in Holland twice, and in 1614 was appointed secretary of state. He was well versed in political affairs, and especially in matters of trade and war. He died 1617, aged 52. His Memorials of Affairs of State under Elizabeth and James I. &c. were published in 3 vols. fol. 1715, by Edmund Sawyer.

WIRLEY, William, Rouge croix pursuivant, was a native of Leicesterhire, and became known for his great skill in the knowledge of heraldry. He died at the Heralds' college, Feb. 1618, and was buried in St. Benet's church, Paul's wharf. He published 1592, the True Use of Armoury showed by History, and plainly proved by Example, 4to. He made some valuable collections of ancient records, &c. preserved in the Heralds' college.

WIRSUNGUS, John George, a native of Bavaria, professor of anatomy at Padua, where, in 1642, he discovered and explained the pancreatic duct. He was meanly assassinated by some rivals, who were jealous of his professional celebrity.

WISCHART, William, D. D. a native of Dalkeith. He was educated at Utrecht, and on his return to Scotland was arrested as if concerned in the Rye-house plot. At the revolution he returned from Holland, where he had taken refuge, and became one of the ministers of Leith, and in 1716 was appointed principal of Edinburgh university, and one of the city ministers. His Theologia, consisting of 120 sermons, is a valuable system of Calvinistical divinity. He died at Edinburgh, 1727, aged 70.

WISCHEART, George, D. D. a native of Yester in East Lothian, educated at Edinburgh university, where he took his degrees. On the breaking out of the civil wars, he followed the fortunes of the illustrious Montrose, to whom he was chaplain, and on his defeat by Lesley in 1645, he was among the prisoners. He with difficulty escaped the death which his unhappy fellow-prisoners suffered, and after some years of confinement he withdrew to the continent, and at the restoration returned, and became bishop of Edinburgh. In this high situation he shewed great benevolence of heart and forgiveness of injuries, and with all his power assisted some of his most virulent persecutors, and procured their pardon from government. This enlightened prelate wrote an Account of the Wars in Scotland, and the history of his early patron, the marquis of Montrose, 8vo. and died at Edinburgh, 1669, aged 60.

WISCHER, Cornelius, a Dutch engraver in the 17th century. His works from the most famous Fleish painters are much admired. — His brother John, and his relations Lambert and Nicholas, were also eminent artists.

WISE, Francis, an English divine, born 3d Oct. 1695, and educated at New college school. He was admitted of Trinity college, Oxford 1711, and became fellow of the society, and assistant to Dr. Hudson in the Bodleian library. He obtained Ellesfield vicarage, Oxfordshire, from his pupil lord Guildford, and the rectory of Rotherfield Grays from his college. He was also keeper of the archives of the university, and Radcliffe librarian, and died at Ellesfield, 6th Oct. 1767, aged 62, universally beloved. He published Annales Alfredi Magni, 8vo. — Letter to Dr. Mead on some Antiquities in Berkshire — on the White Horse, Berks — the Red Horse, Warwickshire, &c. — Catalogus Nummorum Antiq. in Bodleian. &c. — Inquiries on the first Inhabitants, Languages, &c. of Europe, 4to. — on the Chronology of Fabulous Ages, 4to. &c.

WISSING, William, a portrait painter, born at Amsterdam, 1656, and brought up under Dodaens at the Hague. He visited England, where he obtained celebrity as the friend and happy imitator of sir Peter Lely. He painted Charles II. and all the royal family, and in his reputation was the rival of Kneller. He died at Burleigh-house, Northamptonshire, 10th Sept. 1687, aged only 31, and was buried in St. Martin's church, Stamford, where a marble tablet was erected to his memory by lord Exeter.

WISSOWATIUS, Andrew, a native of Philliporia in Lithuania, grandson of Faustus Socinus. After spreading the tenets of his grandfather in Holland, France, and England, he returned to Poland, where he acquired popularity at the head of the Socinians, till by religious persecution, he was obliged to fly for safety to Amsterdam. He assisted in the Bibliothéque de Freres Polonois, 9 vols. folio, and published besides, Religio Rationalis, &c. and other works. He died in Holland, 1668.

WITASSE, Charles, a French ecclesiastic, born at Chauny, 11th Nov. 1660. He became professor of theology at Paris, but incurred the displeasure of the court by refusing to receive the pope's bull, called Unigenitus. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 10th April 1716, aged 56. He wrote Letters on Easter — Examination of Hardouin's Councils — treatises on Theological Subjects, &c.

WITHERS, George, an English poet, born 11th June, 1588. His satirical verses on the court and government exposed him to persecution, and for his "Abuses Whipt and Stript," he was sent to prison. He took up arms in favor of the parliament, and when taken by the king's troops, was with difficulty saved from hanging by sir John Denham. He was afterwards one of Cromwell's major-generals appointed to overawe and oppress the country. At the restoration he was stripped of his fortune and power, and was for some time imprisoned in Newgate, and in the Tower. He died 1667. His poetical pieces are very numerous, and some of them possess merit.

WITSIUS, Herman, a learned divine, born at Enckhuyfen

huyfen in North Holland, 1626. He so distinguished himself, that he was appointed professor of divinity at Franeker, afterwards at Utrecht, and then at Leyden, where he died 1708. He published several important works, which display great learning, judgment, and piety. The best known of these are Ægyptiaca & Decaphylon, 4to. — the Economy and the Covenants between God and Man, a valuable work, translated into English, 3 vols. 8vo. — Historia Hierosolymitana — Miscellanea Sacrorum — Maletem. Leydenf. &c.

WITT, John de, Vid. DE WITT.

WITT, Emanuel de, a native of Alkmaer, eminent as a painter. His pieces, in which he introduces architecture, are particularly valuable. He died 1692, aged 85.

WITTICHUS, Christopher, a native of Brieg in Silesia, professor of mathematics at Herborn, afterwards at Duisburg, and then theological professor at Nimeguen, and lastly at Leyden, where he died 1687, aged 62. He wrote Theologia Pacifica, 4to. — Anti-Spinosa — de Deo & Attributis, 4to. — Consensus Veritatis.

WOFFINGTON, Margaret, an English actress, born at Dublin, 1718. She first appeared in London at Covent-garden in 1738, in sir Harry Wildair, and acquired great celebrity, though she failed in her attempts to rival Mrs. Pritchard and Mrs. Cibber. She afterwards acted Cordelia and Ophelia with great success under Garrick, with whom she continued at Drury-lane till she made a new engagement with Rich. She was afterwards on the Dublin stage with Mr. Sheridan, and died in London of a gradual decay, 1760.

WOIDE, Dr. a native of Poland, who found friends and protection in England, by his learning and his assiduities. He was minister of the German chapel in the Savoy, and of the Dutch chapel at St. James's, and assistant librarian at the British museum. He published the Coptic Lexicon of la Croze, which had remained in manuscript since 1720, and edited besides the Alexandrian MS. of the New Testament, preserved in the British museum, and also Scholtz's Egyptian Grammar. He was engaged in the compilation of an Egyptian Lexicon, but died before its completion, 1790, after a residence of 25 years in England.

WOLFE, James, a celebrated English general, born at Westerham, Kent, Jan. 1726, son of lieutenant-general Edward Wolfe. He early embraced the military profession, and distinguished himself at the battle of la Feldt, and was present afterwards at every engagement during the war, and every where gathered fresh laurels by his valor, coolness, and judgment. At the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, instead of resigning himself to indolence and pleasure, he devoted himself assiduously to military labors, and when lieutenant-colonel of Kingsley's regiment, he introduced such order and discipline in the corps, that the gallant conduct of the soldiers in the plains of Minden is proverbial to this day. These great talents did not long remain in obscurity; when Mr. Pitt was placed at the head of affairs, the genius of Wolfe was called forth to ex-cute his gigantic plans. Though the meditated attack on Rochfort was abandoned, the fall of Louisburg displayed to the admiration of the nation, the abilities of their favorite general, who was immediately after selected, 1759, for the command of the expedition against Quebec. In this bold enterprise, the many difficulties from situation and from superior numbers, were quickly surmounted by perseverance and by military stratagem, and the English troops, permitted to face their enemy, triumphed over all opposition; but in the moment of victory, the conqueror received a ball through his wrist; yet, disregarding the wound, he animated his men to the battle. A second ball, a few minutes after, shot him through the body, and rendered it necessary to carry him off to the rear of the troops. In the last agonies his attention was roused by the cry of "they run!" and eagerly inquiring who ran, he no sooner heard the reply, "the defeated French," than he exclaimed, "then I thank God, and I die contented," and instantly expired, 13th Sept. 1759. His remains were brought to England, and buried with becoming pomp in Westminster abbey, where a splendid monument was erected by the nation to his honor. His glorious death forms the subject of a beautiful painting by West, which has been engraved in a masterly manner by Woollet. To the great abilities of the general, to steadiness, strength, and activity of mind, Wolfe united the milder virtues of life, sincerity and candor, a quick sense of honor, of justice, and public liberty. While he bore the meed of superiority in constitutional courage, in penetration, in cool judgment, and in unshaken presence of mind, he was equally admired and respected for beneficence and charity, and the estimation of the great was accompanied by the love of the soldiery and the gratitude of the poor.

WOLFF, Christian, a celebrated writer, born at Breslau, 24th Jan. 1679. From his native town he went in 1699 to Jena university, where he made a most extraordinary progress, and in 1702 he repaired to Leipzig, where the following year he opened his lectures by a famous dissertation, called Philosophia Practica Universalis Methodo Mathematica Conscripta. His publications and the number of his pupils increased his reputation, and he was liberally invited by the universities of Gießen and of Halle to accept the professorial chair of mathematics. He accordingly went to Halle 1707, and to his academical honors was soon after added the title of counsellor to the king of Prussia. These flattering prospects were, however, soon obscured; in his Latin oration on the morality of the Chinese, in 1721, he spoke with such applause of their philosophy and of their virtues, that the university was offended, and not only his tenets were reprobated, but he was by the representation of the body of divines, ordered on pain of the severest punishment to leave the country in 24 hours. From this ungrateful society he retired to Cassel, and became professor of mathematics and philosophy at Marburg, and counsellor to the landgrave. The favorable opinion of the learned and the great continued to atone for the persecution of the Halle university, he was declared honorary professor of the Petersburg academy of sciences, and and admitted member of that of Paris, and honored with the title of counsellor of regency by the king of Sweden. The prejudices of his enemies at last passed away, and in 1741 with some reluctance he obeyed the commands of the king of Prussia, and assumed the office of privy counsellor, of vice-chancellor, and of professor of the law of nature and of nations in the university of Halle. He afterwards was raised on the death of Ludwig to the dignity of chancellor of the university, and created a baron of the Roman empire. This great man, whose whole life was devoted to advance the interests of science and of virtue, died at Halle, of the gout in his stomach, 9th April, 1754, aged 76. His works in Latin and German are more than 60 in number, the best known of which are, a Course of Mathematics, 2 vols. 4to. — Philosophia Rationalis, five Logica, 4to. — a System of Metaphysics, 4to. — Jus Naturæ, 8 vols. 4to. — Jus Gentium, 4to. — Horæ Subsecivæ Magdeburg — Dictionary on the Mathematics — Specimen Physicæ ad Theologium Natural. Applicatæ, 8vo. &c. Though precise and correct as a mathematician, his style as a writer is rough and unpolished, his diction is barbarous, and his phrases inelegant. His German works are said to be superior in execution to his Latin.

WOLFF, Jerome, a native of the Grisons, who studied at Tübingen, and became, by application, librarian and principal of the college of Augsburg, where he died of the stone 1581, aged 64. He wrote translations of Domosthenes and Hicrates — de Vero & Licito Astrologiæ Usu — de Expeditâ Utriusque Lingue, &c.

WOLLASTON, William, an able divine, born of an ancient family at Coton Clanford, Staffordshire, 26th March, 1659. He was of Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, but not being able to obtain a fellowship he became in 1682 assistant to the master of Birmingham school, and was four years after appointed under-master, but the death of a rich relation in 1688 left him in possession of an ample estate, and at liberty to quit his laborious employment. From Birmingham he came to reside in London, where he soon after married. In his retirement, which he loved above the tumults of public life, and which he refused to quit for high preferment in the church, he zealously devoted himself to literature, and in his opinions and conduct shewed the liberal minded man. The best known of his writings is his Religion of Nature Delineated, a popular work, of which more than 10,000 copies were sold in a few years. In his old age he had the misfortune to break his arm, and this increasing the disorders of a weak constitution hastened his death, which happened 29th Oct. 1724, at his house in Charter-house square. He was buried at Great Finborough where he had an estate, near his wife, who died in 1720, and who brought him 11 children, of whom only seven survived him. His Religion of Nature exposed him to the censures of some divines, because he makes no mention of revealed religion, and attempts to explain the truth of religion on mathematical principles, and on the obligations of truth, reason, and virtue. Lord Bolingbroke in calling the work a strange theism, as dogmatical and absurd as artificial theology, does not deny the author to be a man of parts and of learning, a philosopher and a geometrician. The work must be, however, considered as a composition of great merit, and one of the best written in the English language. It has appeared in 4to. and in 8vo.

WOLLEBIUS, John, a divine of Basil, author of Compendium Theologiæ, a work of merit, translated into various languages. He died 1629.

WOLMAR, Melchior, a native of Rotweil in Switzerland, known as the instructor of Calvin and of Beza in the Greek language. He was patronized by Ulric duke of Wirtemberg, and became professor of law at Tübingen. He died of an apoplexy at Eisenach 1561, aged 64. He wrote Commentaries on the two first Books of the Iliad.

WOLSELEY, Robert, son of sir Charles W. of Staffordshire, who espoused the cause of the parliament against the king, and was one of Cromwell's lords, was in favor with king William, and was his envoy to Brussels, 1693. He wrote a curious preface to Rochester's Valentinian — a translation of Virgil's Æneas meeting Dido, &c.

WOLSEY, Thomas, a celebrated favorite at the court of Henry VIII. He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, 1471, not the son of a butcher as generally reported, but descended from a poor but respectable family, and he entered so early at Oxford that he was bachelor of arts at the age of 14, and consequently called the boy bachelor. He became fellow of Magdalen college, and when master of arts he exchanged the care of Magdalen school for the tuition of the sons of Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorset. By the favor of his patron he obtained the rectory of Lymington in Somersetshire, but here he behaved with such irregularity that he was set in the stocks for being drunk of a Sunday, by sir Amias Paulet, a punishment which was severely visited on the upright magistrate, by a long imprisonment of six years, when the offending clergyman was raised to the height of power. After the death of Dorset he recommended himself to the notice of Dean archbishop of Canterbury, and at last became chaplain to the king, to whom he rendered himself so agreeable, that he was entrusted with the negotiation of his intended marriage, with Margaret duchess of Savoy. He used such dispatch in this business that he was rewarded with the deanery of Lincoln, and on the accession of Henry VIII. he maintained his influence at court, and saw new honors soon heaped upon him. He was made rector of Torrington, canon of Windsor, registrar of the garter, and prebendary and dean of York. In the expedition to France 1513, he attended the king, to direct the supplies and the provisions for the wants of the army, and on the taking of Tournay he was appointed by the conqueror bishop of that city. In 1514 he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and eight months after removed to York, the next year he was made cardinal of St. Cicely, and a few months after lord chancellor of England. To these high favors were added the confidence of the king, and consequently the disposal of all places of trust, of honor, and power in the kingdom. Thus placed at the head of affairs, he governed the nation at his pleasure, and that he might confirm more strongly his ascendancy over the king, he withdrew his attention from all public affairs, and by the most artful policy he fanned his pleasures and administered most liberally to the gratification of his most licentious desires. Absolute at home, where his expences exceeded the revenues of the crown, he was courted and flattered by foreign princes, and according to his caprice, or the demands of his avarice, the support of England was promised to favor the ambitious views either of France or of Germany, or of the pope. His disappointment in his application for the popedom after the death of Leo X. in which he was deceived by the emperor, was soon after followed by the displeasure of his capricious master, who in the matter of his divorce expected from his favorite an obsequious and submissive assistant. The cardinal, equally afraid of the pope and of the king, wished to stand neuter, but Henry, indignant at his conduct, stripped him of his honors 1529, and caused him to be impeached in parliament by a charge of 44 articles. Though the treasonable charges were repelled in the house of commons by the influence and exertions of his friend Cromwell, he was desired to retire to York, where he was soon after arrested by the earl of Northumberland, on a fresh charge of high treason. Wolsey struck with the greatness of his disgrace, fell sick, and as he proceeded by slow journies to London he stopped at Leicester, where he is said to have taken poison to put an end to his wretched existence. He expired 29th Nov. 1530, and a few hours before his death he exclaimed in accents of agony: "Had I served my God with the same zeal that I have served the king, he would not have forsaken me in my old age." His remains were buried in the abbey of St. Mary de Pratis, at Leicester. The history of Wolsey exhibits in the most striking degree the vicissitudes of fortune and the inconstancy of human affairs. His private character was so depraved, that he deserved little of the favors of his master, but with a capricious tyrant the most profligate and vicious are generally the most useful and convenient ministers. It has been truly observed, that few ever fell from so high a station with less crimes objected against them. It must indeed be acknowledged that he was a man of great abilities, well acquainted with the learning of the times, sagacious as a politician, and well versed in the intrigues of courts. Notwithstanding, however, his vices and his ambition, his schemes for the promotion of literature in the nation were noble and well imagined. He not only founded seven lectures in the university where he had been educated, but Christ church owes its greatness to his munificence and liberality. He also founded a school at Ipswich. Besides the honors already enumerated, he possessed the commission of pope's legate, a later, he was abbot of St. Alban's, bishop of Winchester and Durham, and he held in fann the dioceses of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, and had in his retinue 800 servants, amongst whom were ten lords, 15 knights, and 40 esquires.

WOLTERS, Henrietta, a lady of Amsterdam, eminent as a miniature painter. She died 1741, aged 49.

WOLZOGEN, Lewis de, a native of Amersford, who studied at Paris and Geneva, and became a zealous partizan of the Socinians. He settled at Amsterdam as professor of ecclesiastical history, and died there 13th Nov. 1690, aged 58. He wrote Orator Sacer, five de Ratione Concionandi, 8vo. — Dissertatio Critico-Theologica, &c.

WOMACK, Lawrence, D. D. author of the examination of Tilenus before the Friars, 12mo. against the puritans — the Calvinistic Cabinet Disclosed, 12mo. — the Result of False Principles, or Error convinced by its own Evidence, and other tracts against the Calvinists, was a divine of Cambridge, who became archdeacon of Suffolk 1660, and was made bishop of St. David's 1683. He died 1685.

WOOD, Anthony, an able antiquary, born at Oxford, 17th Dec. 1632. He was educated at New college school, and at Thame school, and in 1647 entered at Merton college. He took his master's degree in 1655, and earnestly devoted himself to the study of the antiquities of the colleges and churches of Oxford. His labors were so highly esteemed that after they were prepared for the press in English, Dr. Fell dean of Christ church procured them, and employed Peers one of the students of his college to translate the work into Latin. The work thus left to the mercy of an obstinate and perverse translator, and of a capricious editor, appeared in 1674, in 2 vols. fol. under the title of Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis, but much altered and disfigured by several errors. He published another work in 1691, of which a second edition under the care of bishop Tanner appeared in 1721, under the title of Athenæ Oxonienses, containing an account of the great men who flourished in the university from 1500 to 1695, to which were added the Fasti, in 2 vols. fol. Though Wood in these works claimed the merit of being free from prejudice and party, he yet reflected with such asperity on the character of lord Clarendon the chancellor of the university, that he was indicted for defamation in the court of the university, and his expulsion for greater notoriety was inserted in the Gazette 1693. Though an indefatigable collector, and a diligent antiquary, Wood deserves to be censured for his narrowness of mind and his violent prejudices, totally unworthy the dignity of the historian. He died at Oxford 29th Nov. 1695, of a retention of urine. His papers and books were deposited agreeably to his will in the Ashmolean museum. Wood vindicated his work in an 8vo. volume, against the attacks of bishop Burnet.

WOOD, Robert, an English writer. He travelled with his friends Bouverie and Dawkins into the East, and visited the plains of Troas, and the remains of Balbec and Palmyra. He became under-secretary of state in 1764, under lord Granville, and in the midst of his political engagements prepared the account of his observations for the press, which he published under the title of Essay on the Original Genius of Homer, a work of great merit. He died 1771.

WOOD, Isaac, a painter in oil, and in black lead on vellum, was patronized by Wriotesley, duke of Bedford. He was in his conversation very facetious, and particularly happy in his application of the ludicrous passages of Hudibras. He died 24th Feb. 1752, aged 63.

Woon,

WOOD, James, professor of divinity, and provost of St. Salvador's college, St. Andrew's, was author of a book against the independents, and died 1664.

WOODALL, John, an English surgeon, who went, in 1589, with the troops sent by Elizabeth to assist Henry IV. After travelling over Europe he settled in London, and became member of the corporation of surgeons, and practised as a physician. He was also surgeon to St. Bartholomew's hospital, and surgeon general to the East India company. He wrote Surgeon's Mate, 1617, and a supplement to it called Viaticum. He died 1638, aged 69.

WOODCOCK, Robert, was so attached to music that, to indulge his favorite pursuits, he quitted a lucrative place which he held under government. He was eminent as a composer, and as a player on the hautboy. Several of his compositions have been published. He died 10th April 1728, aged 36. He also excelled as a painter of sea pieces.

WOODFORD, Samuel, an English divine, born in the parish of All-Hallows on the Wall, London, 15th April 1636. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, and after taking his first degree in arts, he entered at the Inner Temple. At the restoration he was ordained by bishop Morley, and obtained the rectory of Hartley-Maudet, Hants, to which were afterwards added a prebend of Chichester, and in 1680, a prebend of Winchester. He was member of the Royal society, and was, in 1677, created D.D. by archbishop Sancroft, and he died 1700. He wrote poems of considerable merit — Paraphrase on the Psalms, five books — Paraphrase on the Canticles — the Legend of Love, three cantos — to the Muse, a pindaric ode — Paraphrase of some of the Hymns of the Old and New Testament — occasional compositions in English rhymes, &c.

WOODHEAD, Abraham, a native of Maltham, Yorkshire, bred up at University college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. The restoration replaced him in his fellowship, which he had lost by the civil war; but his conversion to the Roman catholic faith proved injurious to his future advancement in the church. He lived in retirement at Hoxton, and was considered the best writer of his time in favor of the tenets which he had adopted. He wrote the Guide to Controversy, &c. The best part of his numerous pamphlets are anonymous, they were ably answered by Dr. Stillingfleet. He died 1678.

WOODVILLE, Elizabeth, widow of sir John Grey, who lost his life in the battle of Bernard's Heath, captivated the heart of Edward IV. when she appeared before him to solicit the restitution of her husband's property. In consequence of this interview the frail monarch married her, and from this union was born the princess Elizabeth, whose marriage with Henry VII. cemented a reconciliation between the violent partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster. The conduct of Edward, and his partiality for his concubines, were not calculated to ensure domestic happiness to Elizabeth, yet, after his death she ventured to take for her third husband, lord Stanley. She died in a monastery, where her son-in-law, Henry VII. had confined her.

WOODVILLE, William, a native of Cumberland, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M.D. in 1775. He went to settle at Denbigh, and in 1782 removed to London, where he became physician to the Middlesex dispensary, and soon after, to the small-pox hospital. He wrote a dissertation De Irritabilitate, medical botany, 4to. an useful work, and some tracts on the small-pox and the cow-pox. He was an able practitioner, and died at the small-pox hospital, Pancras, 26th April 1805, aged 58.

WOODWARD, John, a natural philosopher, born in Derbyshire, 1st May 1665. He was well educated at a private school, and then bound apprentice to a linen-draper in London; but literature and philosophy had more charms for him than the business of the counter. His studies were assisted by the kindness of Dr. Barwick, and on the vacancy of the medical professorship at Gresham college, in 1692, he was honorably elected to the chair. In 1693 he was chosen fellow of the Royal society, and two years after he was honored by Dr. Tenison, the primate, with the degree of M.D. He published, in 1695, his Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth, &c. with an account of the Universal Deluge, and of its effects, 8vo. This book, as containing some curious facts and bold conjectures, had many admirers, and more enemies, and it passed in 1702, to a second edition, and in 1723, to a third; but it was not followed by a larger work, as the author had promised. He was in 1702, chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and he published some intelligent papers in the philosophical transactions. In 1718 he published the State of Physic, and of Diseases, with an inquiry into the causes of their increase, &c. and of the small-pox, which produced a bitter controversy with Dr. Mead. He died at his house, Gresham college, 25th April, 1728, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He founded a professorship at Cambridge, with a salary of 150l. for a lecture, to elucidate the Natural History of the Earth, &c. and the first professor appointed was Dr. Conyers Middleton, 1731, who resigned two years after.

WOODWARD, Henry, a comedian of eminence, born in London 1717, and educated at Merchant Taylors' school. From the business of a tallow-chandler he became, under the care of Mr. Rich, a popular harlequin on the London stage. With the 6000l. which he had amassed by his profession, he commenced manager of Dublin theatre, and imprudently lost the whole, and returned again for support to Covent garden. He died 17th April 1777, in consequence of a fall, as he was jumping on a table, on the stage, in the character of Scrub. He was author of Marplot in Lisbon, a farce, and the Man's the Master, a comedy, 1775.

WOOLLETT, William, a native of Maidstone, who became a pupil of Timney, and acquired celebrity by his engravings, especially that of the death of general Wolfe. He was engraver to the king, and died 1783, aged 48.

WOOLSTON, Thomas, an English divine, born 1669

at Northampton, where his father was a tradesman. He was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his degree of B. D. He published in 1705, the old Apology of the Truth for the Christian religion, against the Jews and Gentiles, reviv'd, 8vo. a singular work, which though abounding in new opinions, did not however excite the censures of the learned against him. He afterwards published a Latin dissertation on the authenticity of the letter said to have been written by Pilate to Tiberius, describing our Saviour, &c. 1720, and the next year two letters on the character, &c. of the Quakers — and in defence of the Apostles, and primitive Fathers, &c. His four Free Gifts to the Clergy appeared in 1723 and 4, and soon after his Moderator between an Infidel, and Impostor, &c. which excited a persecution against him, which however was stopped, by the interference of Mr. Whiston. His six discourses on the Miracles of Christ, and his two defences of them, dedicated to six bishops, appeared in 1727, and the three next years, and by their merriment, and humor, their profaneness, and blasphemy, excited emotions of mirth, of indignation, and of horror. In these books he regards the miracles of our Saviour, as related in the gospel, not as real events, and historical facts, but allegorical fables, and while he attempts to disprove them, he treats of them in the most ludicrous, offensive, and indecent language. Thus at war with the good sense, the opinions, and the religion of his country, he soon felt not only the attacks of literary champions, but the prosecution of the law. He was tried for the offence at Guildhall, before lord chief justice Raymond, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine of 100l. As he was unable to pay the fine, he continued to the end of his life within the rules of the king's bench, and died there 27th Jan. 1733, of an epidemic disorder, after an illness of four days, while Dr. Clarke was engaged in soliciting his liberty. In the agonies of death he exclaimed "this is a struggle which all men must go through, which I bear not only patiently, but with willingness." His remains were deposited in St. George's church-yard, Southwark.

WOOTON, John, an eminent landscape painter, was particularly distinguished for his paintings of dogs, and horses, for which he regularly received 40 guineas, and 20 when less than life. He quitted business in 1761, and his collection of drawings, and prints, was sold by public auction. He died 1765.

WORLIDGE, Thomas, an engraver, and portrait painter, who published a book of gems from the antique. Some of his etchings from Rembrandt, were particularly admired. He died 1766.

WORMIUS, Olaus, a native of Arhusen, in Jutland, who studied at Lunenburg, Emmeric, and Marburg, and in 1607 came to Strasburg, where he applied himself to physic. He visited Italy, and on account of his great learning was honorably received by the universities of Padua, Sienna, and Montpellier, and after travelling over France, Holland, and England, he took his doctor's degree at Basil, and at last settled at Copenhagen, where he obtained the chair of professor of belles lettres. In 1615, he was advanced to the chair of Greek, and in 1624, to that of medicine, and acquired both reputation and opulence, as the physician of the court. He obtained a canonry of Lunden, from Christiern IV. for his services, and died 1634, aged 66. He was three times married, and the father of 16 children. He wrote Fasti Danici, 1626. — a History of Norway, 4to. — Literatura Danica Antiquissima, Vulgo Gothica Dicta, & de Priscâ Danorum Poesi, 4to. — Monument. Danic. Libri Sex. fol. — Lexicon Runicum, and Appendix ad Monumenta Danica. fol. — Series Regum Daniæ, &c. — Talshoi, or monument. Stroense in Scania, 4to.

WORMIUS, William, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Copenhagen, and applied himself to medical pursuits. He became professor of medicine, historiographer to the king, counsellor of state, &c. and died 1724, aged 71. He wrote Musæum Wormianum, fol. containing an account of the curiosities, preserved in his fathers collection. His eldest son Olaus, was professor of eloquence, history, and physic, at Copenhagen, and author of treatises de Glossopetris — de Viribus Medicamentorum Specificis, &c. He died 1708. Another brother was bishop of Copenhagen, and author of some theological tracts. He died 1737, much respected.

WORDSDALE, James, a painter, the pupil of sir Godfrey Kneller, whose niece he privately married. In consequence of this union he was discarded by his master, but found patrons, and friends in the public, and gained some reputation as a singer, and as a facetious mimic. He was author of songs, of five dramatic pieces, in one of which he acted a part, &c. He died 13th June 1767, and was buried at St. Paul's, Covent-garden.

WORSLEY, sir Richard, a native of the Isle of Wight, who succeeded to the title, on the death of his father sir Thomas, 1768, and in 1775 married a daughter of sir John Fleming, bart. from whom he was divorced in 1782. He was comptroller of the royal household, governor of the Isle of Wight, and member for Newport. In the younger part of his life, he travelled through Europe, and made a fine collection of marbles, statues, and other antiques, engraved and published 2 vols. fol. under the title of Musæum Worlesianum. He published also an History of the Isle of Wight, 1781, 4to. with indifferent plates by Godfrey. He died of an apoplexy, at his seat of Appledurcombe, 8th Aug. 1805, aged 54.

WORTHINGTON, John, D. D. a native of Wales, who was elected to the headship of Jesus college, Cambridge, which he resigned after the restoration. He obtained the cure of St. Benet Fink, in London, and soon after the fire of London was presented to the living of Ingoldsby, near Grantham, Lincolnshire, and to a prebend of Lincoln cathedral. He died at Hackney, where he had resided as lecturer to the church, and was buried there, at the latter end of 1671. His funeral sermon was preached by Tillotson. He published a Form of Sound Words, or a Scripture Catechism, 8vo. — the great Duty of Self-Resignation, 8vo. — the Doctrine of the Resurrection, considered, 8vo. &c.

WORTHINGTON, William, D. D. a native of Merionethshire, educated at Oswestry school, and Jesus college, Oxford, where he took his doctor's degree, 1758.

1758. He was liberally patronized by bishop Hare, who gave him a living in Shropshire, and afterwards another in Denbighshire, and a stall in the cathedral of St. Asaph. He afterwards obtained a stall in York cathedral from archbishop Drummond. He died at his living of Llanrhayader, in Denbighshire, much lamented, 6th Oct. 1778, aged 75. He sent to the press various publications, the best known of which are an essay on the Scheme and Conduct, &c. of Man's Redemption, &c. 8vo. — Historical Sense of the Mosaic account of the Fall proved, &c. — the Evidences of Christianity, deduced from facts, &c. preached at Boyle's lectures, 1766-8, 2 vols. 8vo. — the Scripture theory of the earth, &c. 8vo. — Sermons, &c.

WOTTON, for Henry, an eminent writer, born 30th March 1568, at Bocton hall, Kent, of respectable parents. From Winchester school, he entered at New college, Oxford, and soon after removed to Queen's college, where he became distinguished for wit, and learning. After leaving Oxford, where it is uncertain, whether he took his master's degree, he went to France, Germany, and Italy, and there increased his knowledge of literature, and of the fine arts, during a residence of nine years. On his return to England, he recommended himself by his abilities and politeness to Essex, and became his secretary, but on the fall of that unhappy favorite, he had the good fortune to escape to the continent. At Florence he ingratiated himself with the grand duke, and was confidentially commissioned to go to Scotland, to inform James VI. of a conspiracy formed against his life. Under the assumed name of Octavio Baldi, he passed to Norway, and then to Scotland, where he was received with kindness, and treated with distinction by the king. He had no sooner returned to Florence, than he was informed of the death of Elizabeth, and of the accession of James to the English throne, and he therefore hastened back to his native country, and was greeted with regard and confidence by the king. He was knighted, and sent ambassador to Venice, and afterwards to the United Provinces, and to several of the German courts, where he represented his sovereign with becoming dignity, and truly British independence. For his services to the state he was rewarded with the provostship of Eton, 1623, and he took deacon's orders, as he regarded his ecclesiastical situation incompatible with the character of a layman. He died 1639, deservedly respected in his private as well as his public character. He was buried in the chapel of his college, and, as an enemy to controversy, he caused these words to be engraved on his tomb: Hic jacet hujus sententiae primus auctor, disputandi pruritus ecclesiae scabies. Nomen alias quere. He wrote the Elements of Architecture — Parallels between Essex and Buckingham — Characters of some of the Kings of England — Essays on Education — poems, printed in the Reliquiae Wottoniz, which appeared after his death, 8vo. After he was settled at Eton, he began the life of Martin Luther, with the history of the reformation, but abandoned it at the request of Charles I. to devote himself more laboriously to the History of England, which he, however, never completed.

WOTTON, William, an able divine, born 13th

Aug. 1666, at Wrentham, Suffolk, where his father was rector. He was endowed with astonishing powers of mind, and when four years and three months old, he could read with the greatest ease the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. He was admitted of Catharine hall, Cambridge, before he was 10 years old, and there he maintained his reputation by his astonishing skill in the Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabic, and Syriac, as well as in arts and sciences. He took his first degree in 1679, and was soon after noticed by Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, who patronized him, and afterwards gave him the finecure of Llandrillo in Denbighshire. He had before obtained a fellowship at St. John's college, and in 1693 lord Nottingham gave him the living of Middleton Keynes in Buckinghamshire. In 1694 he published Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning, a work of merit, and as he had been abused by the satirical pen of Swift, he wrote Observations on the Tale of a Tub, which he called an irreligious book, and a most profane piece of ribaldry. In 1701 he published the History of Rome from the death of Antoninus Pius to the death of Severus Alexander, 8vo. under the direction of Dr. Burnet, a work of great merit. In 1707 Tenison conferred on him the degree of D. D. and he was presented by Burnet to a stall in Salisbury cathedral. Though in possession of a moderate income, he was so regardless of economy, that pecuniary difficulties crowded upon him, and obliged him in 1714 to retire to South Wales, where he wrote several books. He died 13th Feb. 1726, leaving only one daughter, the wife of Mr. W. Clarke, canon residentiary of Chichester. His other works are, Discourse concerning the Confusion of Tongues at Babel — Advice to a Young Student — Memoirs of the Cathedrals of St. David's and Llandaff — some sermons — five political anonymous pamphlets, &c. In his character he was a most extraordinary man, as he never forgot any thing which he had read; and what is remarkable, as has been observed, his learning was all in ready cash, which he was able to produce at sight, and with which he could enliven and embellish the most uninteresting subjects.

WOTTON, Edward, a native of Oxford, educated at Magdalen school. He became demy of Magdalen college, and then removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was appointed Greek lecturer. He afterwards travelled into Italy, and took the degree of M. D. at Padua, and after his return to England, practised with great success at Oxford, and then at London, where he was made member of the college of physicians, and physician to Henry VIII. He died 5th Oct. 1555, and was buried in St. Alban's church, London. He published de Differentiis Animalium Libri decem, 1552, a work of merit, and he was the first who paid particular attention to natural history. He began, but did not finish, an History of Insects.

WOUTERS, Francis, a Dutch painter. His landscapes with naked cupids are admired. He was the pupil of Rubens, and lived for some time in England, in the suite of the imperial ambassador. He died 1659.

WOUVERMANS, Philip, a native of Haerlem, who studied painting under John Wynants, and without visiting the schools of Italy, acquired great celebrity. For high finishing, for correctness, and for pleasing composition, he was excelled by few; but his merits were viewed without encouragement, and his labors were unaccompanied with the honorable rewards due to superior talents. He lived poor, and the cares of a numerous family, added to the small recompence which he received for his valuable pieces, contributed to increase the miseries of life. Displeased with the ingratitude of the world, he refused to bring up any of his children to his own profession, and in his last moments he destroyed a box full of designs, &c. He died at Haerlem, 1688, aged 68. His landscapes were particularly happy, and diversified with encampments, with huntings, halts, &c. As he chiefly excelled in the painting of horses, he studied those subjects in which these animals could be introduced to the best advantage. Two of his brothers, Peter and John, were also eminent artists.

WOWER, John, a native of Hamburgh, distinguished as a politician, and as a literary character. He died at Gottorp, where he was governor, 1612, aged 38. He wrote Polymathia, 4to. — Notes on Firmicus, Apuleius, Sidonius, &c. — letters, &c.

WRANGEL, Charles Gustavus, marshal and constable of Sweden, was distinguished for his valor. He burnt the Danish fleet in 1644, beat the Imperialists at Augsburg, 1648, and defeated the Dutch fleet in the passage of the Sound, 1658. He died about 1676.

WRAY, Daniel, a native of London, educated at the Charter-house, and at Queen's college, Cambridge, and distinguished for his learning, his taste, and his acquaintance with the fine arts. He was member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and trustee of the British museum, &c. He died 29th Dec. 1783, aged 82, and universally lamented. He contributed to the Archæologia, Notes on the Walls of Ancient Rome, and Extracts of Letters from Rome on the discovery of a statue of Venus, &c.

WREN, Matthew, an English prelate. He was of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Peter-house, chaplain to Charles I. prebendary of Winchester and Westminster, dean of Windsor, and in 1634, was made bishop of Hereford. He was afterwards translated to Norwich, and in 1638 to Ely. During the civil wars his property was seized, and his person imprisoned in the Tower, where he continued 18 years without being brought to trial. At the restoration he was re-instated in his bishopric, and died at Ely-house, London, 1667, aged 81. He was a man of abilities, and wrote some controversial tracts against the Socinians — Epistolæ Variæ, &c. — the Abandoning of the Scots Government — two sermons, &c.

WREN, Matthew, son of the preceding, was educated at Cambridge, and became member of parliament for St. Michael in Cornwall, and was secretary to James duke of York. He died June, 1672, aged 42. He wrote Consideration on Harrington's Oceana — Monarchy asserted, &c. Lord Clarendon was anxious that he should undertake a confutation of Hobbes' Leviathan, but it does not appear that he engaged in the work.

WREN, sir Christopher, a celebrated English architect and mathematician, nephew to bishop Wren, was born at Knoyle, Wilts, 20th Oct. 1632. At the age of 14 he entered as gentleman commoner at Wadham college, Oxford, where he made astonishing progress in mathematics. He was, about the time of taking his master's degree, elected fellow of All-Souls, and in 1657 he was chosen professor of astronomy in Gresham college, where his lectures on the different phases of Saturn were attended by numerous audiences. In 1661 he succeeded Seth Ward as Savilian professor at Oxford, and in consequence resigned the Gresham professorship, and took the degree of LL. D. His acquaintance with architecture was so great that he was sent for by Charles II. to assist sir John Denham the surveyor general, and in 1663 he was chosen fellow of the Royal society, to whose memoirs he contributed some valuable papers on subjects of astronomy, natural philosophy, and other sciences. In 1665 he went to France, and visited the most curious edifices, and the most remarkable inventions in mechanics in the capital, and on his return home he was appointed architect, and one of the commissioners for the reparation of St. Paul's cathedral. The dreadful conflagration of the city which quickly followed, called for the exertion of the powers of the ingenious architect, but the model for a new capital which he made, though approved by the king and the privy council, was not adopted. His avocations were now so numerous as an architect, and as the successor of sir J. Denham, in the office of surveyor-general of his majesty's works, that he resigned his Savilian professorship in 1673, and the following year received the honor of knighthood. By his advice Greenwich was selected as the best place for the erection of an observatory, and his friend Flamsteed was appointed the first professor. In the improving and beautifying London, his genius was particularly displayed, and the churches which he erected are lasting monuments of his mind. Besides St. Paul the noblest edifice which he raised, he built 53 churches in London, among which St. Stephen Walbrook is particularly celebrated. The monument was also erected by him, and likewise the custom-house, Greenwich hospital, Emanuel college chapel, Trinity college library, Cambridge, the theatre at Oxford, &c. This ingenious man whose architectural labors deserve and receive so much admiration died 25th Feb. 1723, aged 91, and he was buried with great solemnity in the vault of his favorite cathedral, where on the side of a pillar these few words record the greatness of his genius, "Lector, si monumentum requiris, circumspice." Sir Christopher sat twice in parliament, for Plympton in Devonshire 1685, and for Melcombe Regis in 1700. He married the daughter of sir Thomas Coghill of Blechington, Oxon, by whom he had a son, and after her death he took, for his second wife, a daughter of baron Lifford, of Ireland, by whom he had a son and a daughter. He was in 1680 elected president of the Royal society, and in 1684 made comptroller of the works in Windsor castle. Though he never published any thing himself, several of his works have appeared in the philosophical transactions, and in the publications of Dr. Wallis and others. His son of the same name published 1708 a learned work called Numismatum Antiquorum Sylloge, 4to. and died 1747, aged 72.

WRIGHT, Nathan, a learned lawyer, born at Barwell, Leicestershire. He was made lord keeper of the great seal on the removal of lord Somers; but though abused by Burnet, as a strong Tory, devoted to party and fond of money, he adds, that he never was charged with bribery in his court. He was removed in 1705 and passed the rest of life in peaceful retirement at his seat at Caldecot hall, Warwickshire, where he died much respected 4th Aug. 1721.

WRIGHT, Samuel, a dissenting minister born Jan. 30th 1683, at Retford, Notts. He settled in London, where he acquired some reputation as an eloquent and fluent preacher. He published about 40 single sermons, but his best known work is his treatise on the New Birth, or the being born again, without which it is impossible to enter the kingdom of God. He died 3d April, 1746, at his house, Newington Green.

WRIGHT, Edward, a mathematician of Cambridge who attended the earl of Cumberland in his expedition to the Azores in 1589. He wrote the Errors of Navigation corrected, 1599, a work of merit — treatises on the Sphere — on Dialling — Haven-finding Art, and he also constructed a table of Meridional Parts, and tables of the Sun's Declination. He died about 1620.

WRIGHT, Edward, an English writer, who attended lord Macclesfield in his travels in 1720-2, of which he wrote an account called Observations, &c. 2 vols. 4to. an interesting work, though written in inelegant language.

WRIGHT, Abraham, a native of London, educated at Oxford, where he was public orator. During the civil wars he lived as tutor in several respectable families, and died rector of Oakham church 1690. He wrote Deliciae Deliciarum — Commentary on the Psalms — on the Pentateuch — sermons — a collection of poems, or Parnassus Biceps, &c.

WRIGHT, Joseph, a native of Derby, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Hudson, and in 1773, visited Italy to improve himself. Two years after he returned to England, and died in his native town 1797, aged 63. His landscapes, and historical pieces are highly valued.

WRIGHT, Paul, an English divine, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He obtained Oakley vicarage, and Burden chapel, Essex, and Snoreham rectory, 1739, on the presentation of the governors of Bridewell, St. Thomas, and the other city hospitals. He re-published, in 1774, Heylyn's Help to English History, 8vo.; but his Chauncey's History of St. Alban's, for which he had printed proposals, and received subscriptions, never appeared. A Family Bible with notes was published under his name. He died 1785.

WURMSER, Dagobert Sigismund, count, field-marshal

in the service of Austria, was a native of Alsace. After being five years in the French armies he enlisted in the service of the emperor, and by his merit and valor, rose to the highest ranks. He was, in 1793, commissioned to cover the siege of Mentz, and he soon after attacked the Weissenburg lines, while the duke of Brunswick fell on the left of the French army, and prince Waldeck on the right. Victorious in his attack, he pushed his conquest into Alsace, and took Haguenau, Drusenheim, &c. These advantages were counterbalanced by the fatal battle of Trischweiler, in which he was defeated; but the following year he repaired his losses by the taking of Mannheim. In 1796 he hastened to the relief of Mantua, and for two successive days defeated the French on the borders of the lake of Garda. The fortune of Bonaparte, however, prevailed against him at Castiglione, Montechiaro, and Lodano, and afterwards at Roveredo, and at the Brenta, and after the severest losses, he penetrated through the enemy, and threw himself into Mantua. After the most determined resistance, Mantua, reduced by famine and by sickness, surrendered 2d Feb. 1797, to the conqueror, on the most honorable terms. The aged commander retired to Vienna, where he was received with the honor which his services and his years deserved, and he was appointed governor of Hungary, where he died Aug. 1797, aged above 80.

WYAT, sir Thomas, a learned courtier in the service of Henry VIII. He was born of a respectable family in Kent, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, which he afterwards quitted for Oxford. He was knighted by Henry, and his abilities usefully employed in various embassies on the continent. He was author of several poems, printed in 1565, with those of his friend the earl of Surrey. He was the first who turned into English metre, David's Psalms. He died 1541, aged 38.

WYCHERLEY, William, an eminent comic writer, born at Cleve, in Shropshire, 1640. At the age of 15 he went to France, where he embraced the Roman catholic tenets, and on his return home, in 1660, he resided at Oxford, though he was not admitted member of the university. He afterwards returned to the protestant faith, and entered at the Middle Temple, but soon preferred the labors of literature to the dry studies of the law. In the course of 10 years he produced four comedies; Love in a Wood — the Gentleman Dancing Master — Plain Dealer — and Country Wife, printed together in 1712, and the popularity of these pieces recommended him to the notice of the great, the witty, and the fair. He was noticed not only by Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and by the duchess of Cleveland, who admitted him to the last degree of intimacy, but by Charles II. who visited him when ill, at his private apartments, and enabled him to remove to the south of France for the recovery of his health. On his return Wycherley was offered by the king, the place of governor to his son, with an ample salary; but his marriage with the widowed countess of Drogheda, soon after offended his royal patron, and involved him in difficulties. Though the countess, who was jealous, fond of him to a ridiculous degree, bestowed on him all her property, yet, at her death, which happened soon after, his right to the succession was disputed, and in consequence of law-suits, he was thrown into prison by his unfeeling creditors. Here he languished for seven long years, till James II. going to see the Plain Dealer, was so pleased with the play, that he offered to pay the debts of the unfortunate author, and settled an annuity of 200*l.* on him. Wycherley, however, from false delicacy, was ashamed to give an account of his debts, and thus still continued involved in distress. Though averse to the troubles of a married life, he wished, as one of his biographers has informed us, to die married, and with this singular passion, in his old age, he took for his second wife a young lady worth 1500*l.* and died eleven days after, 1st Jan. 1715. He was buried in a vault of Covent-garden church. Besides his comedies he wrote some poems, a folio volume of which appeared 1704, and his posthumous works, in prose and verse, were published in 1728, by L. Theobald, 8vo.

WYCKE, Thomas, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a painter. His sea-ports, and his marine views which he drew in Italy, were highly admired. He died 1686, aged 70. His son John was an able artist. He resided for some years in London, where he assisted sir Godfrey Kneller. His paintings of battles, and especially of horses, displayed superior excellence. He died in London 1702, aged 62.

WYKEHAM, William of, a celebrated prelate, born at Wykeham, in Hampshire, 1324. Though his parents were respectable, yet they were poor; but domestic difficulties were forgotten in the liberal patronage of Nicolas Uvedale, lord of the manor of Wykeham, and governor of Winchester, who provided for his education and made him his secretary. By degrees he rose in the estimation of his friend, and was recommended to the notice of Edward III., who appointed him surveyor of his works in the castle and park of Windsor. By his advice this commanding situation was adorned with new buildings, and the present magnificent structure erected; but the inscription of "this made Wykeham," placed on the palace, threatened ruin to the favorite. While, however, his enemies interpreted the ambiguous sentence to his discredit by reading it backward, Wykeham assured his master, that, instead of arrogating to himself the glory of the edifice, he wished posterity to know that the favor of the king, and the care of the building, had raised him from a low situation to an exalted fortune. Thus reconciled to Edward, he rose in consequence, and when in orders he obtained the rectory of Pulham, Norfolk, and after other preferments, he was advanced, in 1366, to the see of Winchester. He was besides, chief warden and surveyor of the king's castles, warden of the forests, keeper of the privy seal, and afterwards secretary to the king. In 1367 he was appointed chancellor of England, and continued in the high office till 1371, when he was deprived of it by the representation of the parliament, who inveighed against the too extensive power of the ecclesiastics. Though much engaged in affairs of state, he paid particular attention to the business of his diocese; abuses were redressed, improvements in the regulation and discipline of the church introduced, and the houses and palaces belonging to the see repaired. With the most munificent intentions also for the encouragement of learning and piety, the bishop determined to appropriate the large possessions which he had acquired by the favor of his sovereign, in the endowment of two colleges. In 1373 a school was established at Winchester; but his noble designs were interrupted by the jealousy or persecution of the duke of Lancaster, who accused him before the king as guilty of various misdemeanors, till the attachment of the people, and the interference of the clergy, restored him to the favor of the monarch, and to the possession of his see. Under the weak reign of Richard II. he labored assiduously to effect his noble purpose, and under the king's patent, New college Oxford was begun in 1380, and finished 1386, and Winchester begun the following year, and completed in 1393. The virtuous prelate enjoyed the gratification of seeing, before his death, his two noble foundations flourish, and his example was followed soon after by his scholar Chicheley, who founded All-Souls, and by Henry VI., who, on the same plan, founded the colleges of Eton, and of King, Cambridge. Wykeham died at South Waltham, 27th Sept. 1404, and was buried in his own oratory in Winchester cathedral. Little is known of the private character of this great founder; but if he had any failings, they were obscured in that spirit of beneficence and of charity which, in his two noble establishments, has so largely contributed to the advancement of literature, and of happiness through the nation. His life has been written by Lowth, who thus has paid a becoming tribute of praise and gratitude to the memory of the illustrious prelate, by whose munificence his education had been formed at Winchester and at Oxford.

WYNANTZ, John, a native of Haerlem, eminent as a painter. He was the master of Wouvermans and Vander Velde, and in the use of his pencil he acquired celebrity and independence. His landscapes were much admired. He died 1670, aged 70.

WYNDHAM, sir William, an eminent statesman, born about 1687. From Eton school he went to Christchurch, and afterwards travelled over the continent for improvement and information. On his return he was chosen member of parliament for Somersetshire, and continued to represent that county till his death. His abilities were so highly respectable, that in the change of ministry in 1710, he was appointed master of the queen's hounds, and afterwards made secretary of state, and in 1713 chancellor of the exchequer. Under George I. he was removed from his offices, and soon after appeared in the ranks of opposition, and ably vindicated the conduct of the duke of Ormond, and of lords Oxford and Strafford. On the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1715, he fell under the suspicion of government, but though he escaped from his pursuers, he at last surrendered himself, and was sent a prisoner to the tower. As he never was brought to trial, it is natural to infer, that no guilt could attach to his conduct, and that the violence of the times, and not a participation in disloyal acts, produced his temporary disgrace. He died at Wells, after a few days' illness, 17th June 1740. Pope has well painted the great powers of his eloquence in these lines :

Wyndham, just to freedom and the throne,
The master of our passions, and his own.

WYTMAN, Matthew, a native of Gorcum, eminent as a painter of landscapes, animals, and conversations. He died 1689, aged 49.

WYVIL, Robert, a bishop of Salisbury, who is known in history for defending his right to Salisbury castle, by producing a champion to fight in single combat against the champion of his opponent William Montacute, earl of Salisbury. The king interfered, and the dispute was at last amicably settled. The bishop presided over his see 46 years, and died 1375.

X E N

XACCA, an Indian philosopher, born at Sica. He was the legislator of the Japanese, and flourished, it is said, a thousand years before the christian era. His memory is regarded with particular honor in China, where he is placed in the number of the gods.

XACCA, Erasmus, a Sicilian in the 17th century, who wrote an Account, in Italian, of the Eruption of Mount Etna in 1669 — besides a didactic poem, in Latin, on Fevers — Brevis Expositio in Psalmos & Cantica Cantic. — Tasso's Jerusalem translated into Latin verse.

XANTIPPE, wife of Socrates, was remarkable for her moroseness and violence of temper. It is said, that the philosopher was acquainted with her character before he married her, and that he took her for his wife more severely to exercise his patience.

XANTIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian, sent to the assistance of the Carthaginians against Regulus and the Romans. Though he defeated the enemy, he was ordered to be thrown into the sea on his return home by the cruel ingratitude of the Carthaginians.

XAUPI, Joseph, a native of Perpignan, author of a Funeral Oration on Lewis XIV. — Historical Researches on the Citizens of Perpignan — two Dissertations, &c. He was an ecclesiastic, and died at Paris universally respected, 7th Dec. 1778, aged 90.

XAVIER, Jerome, a Jesuit, who was missionary in the East Indies, and died at Goa 1617. He wrote History of J. C. and of Peter, in Portuguese, &c.

XENOCRATES, a philosopher of Chalcedon, the disciple of Plato. He was so illustrious for wisdom and integrity, that the judges dispensed with his oath in a court of justice. He died B. C. 314.

XENOPHANES, a Greek philosopher in the age of Socrates. He was of opinion that the moon was an inhabited globe, &c.

XENOPHON, a celebrated Greek historian, born at Athens. He was the pupil and the friend of Socrates, and he distinguished himself in war as the follower of Cyrus, and the active guide of the Greeks in their return from the battle of Cunaxa. His History of Cyrus the Great, and of the expedition of the younger Cyrus, and other works, are well known. He died at Corinth B. C. 360.

XENOPHON, a writer of Ephesus in the beginning of the 4th century. He is author of the Loves of Abrocomas and Anthia, a romance of some merit.

XERXES, king of Persia, son of Darius Hytaspes, is celebrated for his expedition against Greece. Though accompanied by about five million of souls, he was defeated by the valor of the Greeks, and the battles of Thermopylae and Salamis convinced him that the conquest of the country was impossible. He retired in disgrace to Persia, and was slain by Artabanus, B. C. 465. His weeping at the sight of his numerous armies, because not one man of them would survive a 100 years, is mentioned by historians as a proof of the goodness and benevolence of his heart.

XIMENES, Roderick, a native of Navarre, archbishop of Toledo. He laid claim to the primacy in preference to the see of Compostella, at the council of Lyons, 1247, before Innocent IX. and his rights were confirmed. He wrote a Spanish history of little merit.

XIMENES, Francis, a celebrated ecclesiastic, born at Torrelaguna in Old Castille 1437. He was educated at Alcala and at Salamanca, and afterwards went to Rome, where he could obtain no patronage. He became grand vicar to Gonzales de Mendoza, bishop of Sigüenza, and afterwards his wisdom, his learning, and his knowledge of oriental literature, and of theology, procured him friends, and recommended him to the notice of queen Isabella, who named him archbishop of Toledo, 1495. Thus placed at the head of the Spanish church, he bent his thoughts to the reformation of his clergy, and to the more pure and impartial administration of temporal and ecclesiastical affairs through his diocese. He was raised to the purple by Julius II. 1507, and he was entrusted by Ferdinand with the affairs of the government, as prime minister. Not satisfied with the power which he exercised over the state, he was ambitious of military glory, and at his own expence he prepared an expedition against Oran in Africa, which he took from the Moors after displaying great marks of bravery and heroic presence of mind. Ferdinand, who was afraid of his power, appointed him, on his death bed, regent of the kingdom, during the minority of Charles V. and Ximenes exercised this authority not only with wisdom but with severity, and thus raised the complaints of the nobles against his administration. He despised, however, their clamors, satisfied in the good opinion of his sovereign, and in the support of the people to whom he granted great and important privileges. While thus laboring for the glory of his country, this virtuous minister was poisoned in eating trout, and died two months after, 8th Nov. 1517, aged 81. He was buried in the college of St. Ildefonso at Alcala, of which he was the munificent founder, and these remarkable lines are engraved on his tomb:

Condideram musis Franciscus grande Lycæum,
 Condor in exiguo nunc ego sarcophago.
 Prætextam junxi facco, galeamque galero,
 Frater, dux, præful, cardineusque pater.
 Quin virtute meâ junctum est diadema cucullo,
 Cum mihi regnanti paruit Hesperia.

In his character Ximenes was noble and patriotic, the friend of virtue and of merit, the protector of innocence, and the active and generous promoter of industry. He was himself learned, and by his munificence he caused the famous Complutesian Polyglott Bible to be published in his newly erected university of Alcala. This national work which was begun in 1514, was completed in 1517, in 6 vols. fol. and in four languages. The work is now very scarce. He also caused to be published the Missal, and the Breviary Mosa-rabe, under the care of Ortiz. An account of his life has been published by Alvaro Gomez in Spanish, and by Flechier in French.

XIMENES, Joseph Albert, a Spanish ecclesiastic, prior general of the Carmelites. He died 1774, aged 55. He published the two last volumes of the Bulls of his order.

XYLANDER, William, a native of Augsburg, who though born of poor parents, rose to distinction by his abilities. He was educated in the university of Augsburg, and afterwards at Tubingen and Basil, by the friendship of Relinger, a senator of Augsburg, and in 1558 he was invited to fill a Greek professor's chair at Heidelberg. He was in 1566 appointed secretary to the assembly of divines, who held a conference on the eucharist, and he a second time filled the same honorable office in 1581. His great application hastened his death, which happened Feb. 1576, in his 43d year. He was the translator of Dion Cassius, of Marcus Antoninus, of Plutarch, and of Strabo, into Latin, but as he wrote for bread, the execution of these laborious works is occasionally careless and faulty.

XYPHILIN, John, called of Trebizond, from the place of his birth, was made patriarch of Constantinople 1064, and died 1075. He wrote a sermon preserved in the Bibliotheque of the fathers. His nephew of the same name wrote an abridgement of the history of Dion Cassius in Greek 1592, folio, which begins at the 32d book, and is written with little elegance. The work containing the history of the emperors to the time of Alexander son of Mamea, is generally printed with Dion Cassius.

YAL

YALDEN, Thomas, an English poet born at Exeter 1671. He was educated at Magdalen college, school, and after being commoner of Magdalen hall, he obtained a scholarship at Magdalen college, where he had for his fellow students Addison and Sacheverell. He published an Ode on the taking of Namur, and a poem on the death of the duke of Gloucester, and in 1710, obtained a fellowship in his college, and the following year was presented to a small living in Warwickshire. In 1706, he was received into the duke of Beaufort's family, and the next year he took his degree of D. D. and resigned his fellowship. He afterwards obtained the contiguous livings of Chalton, and Cleanville, in Hertfordshire, and the sinecures of Deans, Hains, and Pendles, in Devonshire, and lived in peaceful retirement till the nation was alarmed by the pretended plot of bishop Atterbury. As Dr. Yalden had been intimate with Kelly, the prelate's secretary, he was regarded as an accomplice, and arrested, but as no direct charge could be made against him, except a treasonable explanation of the words "thorough paced doctrines" discovered in his pocket book, he was set at liberty. He died 16th July 1736. He wrote besides, Hymn to Light — Hymn to Darkness, his best poem, &c. His works, says his biographer, deserve perusal, though they are not always polished. His faults are rather omissions of idleness, than the negligence of enthusiasm.

YART, Anthony, an ecclesiastic born at Rouen, 1709. He is author of the Idea of English poetry, in 8 vols. 12mo. 1756, a work of merit, which has made known to the French nation, the labors of several English poets. He wrote besides some poems, and was happy in his epigrams.

YORKE, Philip, Vid. HARDWICKE.

YOUNG, Patrick, a Scotchman, educated at St. Andrew's, and incorporated to the degree of M. A. at Oxford, 1605. He was well skilled in Greek literature, ture and was employed as librarian to the king, at St. James's palace. He published St. Clement's Epistle to the Romans, in Greek and Latin 1637, and he also undertook, but did not finish, the printing of the Septuagint from the Alexandrian MS. presented to the first Charles, by Cyril Lucar. He died 1652.

YOUNG, Robert, a native of Edinburgh, who succeeded the well known Andrew Hart, in the business of printer. When the troubles broke out in Scotland, he was banished for the violence of his conduct, and his printing-presses destroyed. He afterwards returned to Scotland, but was again banished for publishing some papers, in favor of the parliament, and died abroad 1655, aged 62.

YOUNG, Edward, an English poet, born June 1681, at Upham near Winchester, the residence of his father of the same name, who was chaplain to William and Mary, and dean of Sarum, and who died 1705, aged 62, author of two vols. of sermons. He was educated at Winchester school, and in 1703, though superannuated, removed to New college, Oxford, which he left five years after on being chosen fellow of All Souls. He took his degree of LL. D. 1719. He first appeared before the public 1712, as author of an epistle to lord Lansdowne, in consequence of the unpopular creation of 10 peers, in one day by queen Anne, and the next year he prefixed a recommendatory copy of verses to the Cato of Addison. Though distinguished in literary fame, he was prevailed upon by the duke of Wharton, his father's friend, to abandon the prospect of two livings, from his college, worth 600l. a year, and to engage in the tumult of a contested election, as a candidate at Cirencester, an event of which he was afterwards ashamed to the latest period of life. He took orders 1727, and soon after was appointed chaplain to the king, and he paid such respect to the decorum of his new profession, that he withdrew from the stage, his tragedy of the Two Brothers, which was already in rehearsal. He afterwards was presented by his college, to the living of Welwyn, Herts, and in 1739, he married lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the earl of Lichfield, and widow of colonel Lee, whom he had the misfortune to lose on the following year. To relieve himself from the heavy melancholy, which this event brought upon him, he began his Night Thoughts, but though in this work he seemed to bid adieu to the world, he afterwards engaged in politics, by the publication of Reflections on the public Situation of the Kingdom, and at the age of 80 he solicited further patronage from archbishop Secker, and was appointed clerk of the closet to the princess dowager. He died April 1765. Besides his great work the Night Thoughts, he published a poem on the Last Day — Buziris, and the Revenge, tragedies — the Centaur not fabulous, a moral satire — Estimate of Human Life, a sermon — Conjectures on Original Composition — the Love of Fame, the universal passion — some papers in the Spectator, &c. As a poet Young is highly respectable, his Night Thoughts, abound with many sublime passages, and they are written in a strain of true genuine morality, though occasionally obscure. As a clergyman he was particularly exemplary, full of benevolence, goodness, and piety. He was buried by the side of his wife in his church, where a beautiful monument has been erected to his memory. His son survived him.

YRIARTE, Don John d', a native of Teneriffe, who studied at Paris and Rouen, and afterwards became librarian to the king of Spain, at Madrid. He was also, in consequence of his extensive learning, made member of the royal Spanish academy, and interpreter to the Spanish secretary of state. He was author of a Greek Palæographia, 4to. — Miscellaneous Works in Spanish, 2 vols. 4to. — a catalogue of Greek MSS. in the Spanish king's library — Catalogue of Arabic MSS. in the Escorial, 2 vols. fol. &c. He died 1771, aged 69, much and deservedly regretted.

YSE, Alexander de, protestant professor of theology, at Die, in Dauphiné, in the age of Lewis XIV. was deprived of his ecclesiastical honors on suspicion of favoring the Romish church, and died in retirement in Piedmont. He wrote some theological works.

YVON, Peter, a native of Montauban, in Languedoc, known as the follower of Labadie. He accompanied this enthusiast to Holland, and Middleburg, and acquired some celebrity, as a preacher among the Labadists, and as a writer, on mystical subjects.

ZABARELLA, Francis, better known by the name of cardinal de Florence, was a native of Padua. He studied the law at Bologna, and then became professor in that science at Padua, and when the city was besieged by the Venetians in 1406, he was deputed as ambassador to implore the assistance of France. Unable to succeed in his application, he retired to Florence, and afterwards was invited to Rome by pope John XXIII. who not only appointed him archbishop of Florence, but raised him to the rank of cardinal, and sent him in 1413 as his ambassador to the emperor Sigismund, at the council of Constance. He died there 26th Sept. 1417, aged 78, and in respect to his learning and virtues, his funeral was attended by the emperor and all the members of the council. He was author of Commentaries on the Decretals, cretals, &c. 6 vols. folio — harangues — letters — Acta in Conciliis, &c.

ZABARELLA, Bartholomew, nephew of the preceding, was professor of law at Padua, and afterwards became archbishop of Florence. He died 1442, aged 46, respected for his learning and piety.

ZABARELLA, James, son of the preceding, was born at Padua, 1553, and died there 1589. He was well acquainted with the philosophy of Aristotle, and became philosophical professor at Padua, where he published Commentaries on Aristotle's works, folio. He wrote besides, a treatise de Inventione Æterni Motoris, 4to. &c.

ZACAGNI, Lawrence Alexander, a native of Rome, who devoted himself laboriously to literature. He was employed in the care of the Vatican, and published Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum Ecclesiæ Græcæ & Latine, 1698. He died about 1720.

ZACCHIAS, Paul, a native of Rome, who studied medicine, belles lettres, music, and painting, and was patronized by pope Innocent X. to whom he was physician. He published Quæstiones Medico-Legales, 3 vols. folio, 1726, Lyons — and some Italian tracts. He died 1659, aged 75.

ZACHT LEEVEN, Herman, a native of Rotterdam, who died at Utrecht, 1685, aged 77. He was eminent as a painter, and his landscapes, in which he introduces distant objects to great advantage, are much admired.

ZACUTUS, or LUSITANUS, a Jewish physician, born at Lisbon. He studied at Salamanca and Coimbra, and took his medical degrees at Morvedre, and practised at Lisbon, which he quitted 1624, in consequence of the edict of Philip IV. against the Jews. He retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam, 1641, aged 66. His medical works in Latin, were printed at Lyons, 2 vols. folio, 1649. His grandfather was a native of Salamanca, who became famous in Portugal for his great knowledge of chronology and history, on which he wrote Juchasin, a work of Jewish chronology from the creation to the 1500th year of the vulgar æra.

ZALEUCUS, a legislator of Locris in Italy, B. C. 500. He was so strict in the execution of the laws, that when his son was guilty of adultery, a crime which was punished by the loss of both eyes, he caused one of his own eyes, and one of his offending son's, to be put out.

ZALUSKI, Andrew Chrysofom, a native of Poland, who, after visiting the Low Countries, France, and Italy, took orders, and became bishop of Warmia, and grand chancellor of Poland. He was for some time ambassador in Spain and Portugal, and died 1711, aged 61. He was author of some Latin letters, which are valuable for the information which they contain concerning Poland, and the rest of Europe.

ZAMOSKI, John, son of Stanislaus Castellan, of Chelme, a town of Red Russia, studied at Paris and Padua. He made such progress in literature, that he was elected rector of Padua, and he afterwards returned to Poland, where he rose to honorable offices, and was employed as ambassador to France. On the election of Stephen Battori to the Polish throne, he married the new monarch's niece, and became chancellor of the kingdom, and general of the Polish armies. In these high offices Zamoski behaved with judgment and valor; he repressed the attacks of Basilides, czar of Muscovy, and delivered from his yoke the provinces of Polesia, Volesia, and Livonia. On the death of Battori, 1586, his services strongly recommended him to the Polish nobles, but he refused the crown, and placed it on the head of Sigismund of Sweden. This illustrious chief, who deserved the appellation of defender of his country, and of protector of science, died 1605. He was a munificent patron of letters, and in the town which he built, and which bears his name, he founded an university. He wrote while at Padua, two treatises on the Roman Senate — and on the Perfect Senator.

ZAMPINI, Matthew, a native of Recanati, who came to France with Catherine de Medicis, and there supported by his writings the cause of the league. He wrote de Origine & Atavis H. Capeti, &c. 1581, &c.

ZANCHIUS, Basil, an ecclesiastic of Bergamo, who died at Rome, where he was employed in the service of the Vatican, 1560. He wrote Latin poems — Poetical Dictionary, &c.

ZANCHIUS, Jerome, a native of Alzano, who entered in the congregation of the Lateran canons. He embraced the tenets of the protestants by the conversion of Peter the Martyr, who was of the same establishment, and afraid of persecution, he retired, 1553, to Straßburg, where he taught divinity and the philosophy of Aristotle. He quitted Straßburg in 1563, for Chiavene, and in 1568 removed to Heidelberg, where he was appointed professor of theology, and where he died 19th Nov. 1590. He was author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, and other works, published together at Geneva, in 8 vols. folio, 1613. In his character he was a man of moderation, learned, benevolent, and pious.

ZANNICHELLI, John Jerome, a native of Modena, who became distinguished as a physician. He died 11th Jan. 1729, at the age of 67, at Venice, where he had settled, and practised with great celebrity. He wrote Catalogus Plantarum Terrestrium, Marinarum, &c. 1711 — Promptuarium Remediorum Chymicorum, 8vo. — de Myriophyllo Pelagico — Lithographia duorum Montium Veronensium, &c. — de Rusco ejusque Præparatione, 8vo. — Opuscula Botanica, 4to. — History of Plants near Venice, folio. His labors in botanical researches were improved by his son John James, who also was a man of erudition.

ZANNONI, James, a physician of Bologna, who acquired great celebrity as a botanist. He added several curious plants to the catalogue of botany, and published Historia Botanica, fol. 1675, — Rariorum Stirpium Historia, fol. He died about 1682.

ZANOTTI, John Peter, a native of Paris, known as an eminent painter. He studied at Bologna, where his picture of St. Thomas is much admired. He wrote the life of his master Passignelli.

ZANOTTI, Francis Maria Garazzoni, a native of Bologna, educated among the jesuits. After studying the the law for some time, he applied himself to mathematics under Beccari, and became mathematical professor at Bologna, and secretary to the senate. He introduced the study of the Newtonian philosophy in the university instead of the system of Descartes, and acquired such respectability as a professor, that he was in 1766 made president of the institution, of which he had been for some years librarian. Besides two catalogues of the library of the institute, he published some poetical, and philosophical works, and died 1777, aged 85.

ZANZALUS, James, an obscure monk of the sixth century, became founder of the sect of the Jacobites, who consider the perfection of the Gospel, to be the strict observance of fasts. They circumcise children, and acknowledge one nature and person only, in our Saviour, and reject the union of the divine and human nature in his body.

ZAPOLSKI, John de, Vaivode of Transylvania, was in consequence of his valor and services, elected king of Hungary 1526, after the death of Lewis II. He was opposed by Ferdinand of Austria, and supported by Solyman II., and at last he divided the kingdom with his rival 1536, and died four years after.

ZAPPI, John Baptist Felix, a native of Imola, who cultivated the profession of the law with success at Rome. He became acquainted with Carlo Maratti, whose daughter he married, and from his fondness for literature he became one of those who established the academy degli Arcadi at Rome. He died at Rome 1719, aged 52. Some of his verses have been published.

ZARATE, Augustin de, a Spaniard sent to Peru, 1543, as treasurer-general of the Indies. He afterwards was employed in the Low-countries, and in the Mint. He published History of the Discovery, and Conquest of Peru, a work of merit, best edited, Antwerp, 8vo. 1555, and translated into French, 2 vols. 8vo. 1700, Paris, and Amsterdam.

ZARLINO, Joseph, of Chioggia, in the Venetian territory, wrote with great skill and judgement on music. His works have appeared in 4 vols. fol. 1589, and 1602 at Venice, where he died, 1599.

HAZIUS, Hulric, a native of Constance, known for his abilities as professor of law. He died at Eriburg, 1539, aged 74. He wrote Epitome in Usus Feudales — Intellectus Legum Singulares, &c.

ZECHARIAH, one of the minor prophets, was son of Barachias, the son of Addo, and prophesied in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. He encouraged his countrymen in the rebuilding of the temple, and he speaks in such plain terms of the Messiah, that his language appears more the language of an historian, than of a prophet.

ZEGEDIN, Stephen, a native of Zegedin, in Lower Hungary, was one of the first disciples of Luther. He was taken prisoner by the Turks, who treated him with great inhumanity, and on his liberation he became minister of Buda. He died at Keven 1572, aged 67. He wrote Speculum Romanorum Pontific. Historicum, 8vo. — Tabulæ Analyticæ in Prophetas, &c. fol. — Assertio de Trinitate, 8vo.

ZEILLER, Martin, a native of Styria, who became inspector of the schools in Germany, and died at Ulm, 1661, aged 73. He was author of Itinerary of Germany — Topography of Bavaria — of Suabia — of Allace, &c.

ZELL, Ulric, a native of Hanau, eminent as a printer at Cologne. His treatise of St. Augustin de Vita Christi. & de Singularit. Christi. appeared 1477.

ZELOTTI, John Baptist, a painter of Verona, the pupil of Titian. He distinguished himself by the beauty of his coloring, the accuracy of his figures, and the elegant simplicity of his designs. He died 1592, aged 60.

ZENO, the founder of the Stoic philosophy, was a native of Citium, in Cyprus. His school was one of the porticoes of Athens, whence the name of his sect. He defended suicide, and the principle of fatal necessity. He died B. C. 264.

ZENO, the Ilaurian, emperor of the East, married Ariadne, the daughter of Leo I., and died 491, detested for his cruelty, avarice, and debauchery.

ZENO, Apostolo, a native of Venice, of illustrious birth. He early applied himself to literary pursuits, and in 1696 established the academy of Animosi, in his native country, and in 1710, began to publish that well known work called the Giornale de Letterati, which he continued in 30 vols. to 1719. He afterwards went to reside at Vienna, at the invitation of the emperor Charles VI. to whom he was appointed poet, and historiographer. After a residence of 10 years, during which he wrote several plays, for the entertainment of the imperial family, he quitted Vienna to return to Venice, and was succeeded in his appointments by Metastasio. This learned man, who was respected not only by his own countrymen, but by the literati of the age, died at Venice 11th Nov. 1750, aged 81. His works have been printed in 10 vols. 8vo. in Italian, 1744, and contain 63 poems, either tragedies, comedies, or pastoral. He wrote besides some tracts on antiquarian subjects — Dissertations on Vossius, 3 vols. 8vo. — Letters — Dissertation on Italian Historians, 2 vols. 4to. &c. Though a popular poet among the Italians, his pieces exhibit much confusion of plot, and unnecessary episodes, but his invention is striking, his delineations strong, and his dialogues spirited, and interesting. He is compared by the French to Corneille, and his successor Metastasio to Racine.

ZENOBIA, queen of Palmyra, wife of Odenatus, was honored by the Romans with the imperial title of Augusta. She derives not a little glory from her patronage of Longinus the celebrated critic. She was attacked by Aurelian the Roman emperor who was jealous of her power, and she fell into the hands of her conqueror, and died in privacy near Rome.

ZEPHANIAH, one of the 12 minor prophets in the reign of king Josiah, 624 B. C. He foretold the destruction of Nineveh, and exhorted his countrymen to repentance.

ZERUBBABEL, son of Salathiel, was permitted by Cyrus, whose good opinion he had obtained, to rebuild the the temple of Jerusalem. He adorned the new edifice with the vessels which had been plundered from the former temple and carried to Babylon, and the dedication took place 515 B. C.

ZEUXIS, a celebrated painter of Heraclea. His best piece was said to be a picture of Helen. His dispute about pre-eminence with Parrhasius is well known. He flourished about 350 B. C.

ZIANI, Sebastian, doge of Venice, is celebrated for his munificent labors, in embellishing his native city with the most splendid edifices, and adorning them with the best productions of arts. He flourished at the end of the 12th century.

ZIEGLER, James, professor of theology and mathematics at Vienna, was born at Lindau in Swabia, and died 1549. He was author of Notes on some Passages of Scripture, fol. — Description of the Holy Land, fol. 1536 — de Constructione Solidæ Sphæræ, 4to. — a Commentary on Pliny's second Book.

ZIEGLER, Gasper, a native of Leipzig, professor of law at Witteimberg, where he died 1690, aged 69. He wrote de Milite Episcopo — de Diaconis, &c. — de Clero — de Episcopis — Critical Notes on Grotius de Belli et Pacis Jure, &c.

ZIEGLER, Bernard, a native of Misnia, professor of theology at Leipzig. He was much esteemed by Luther and Melancthon, whose doctrines he ably supported. He died 1556, aged 60. He wrote some theological works now little read.

ZIETTEN, John Joachim Van, a native of Worstrau, in the circle of Rupin, distinguished as an officer in the Prussian service. He lost his first commission for challenging his superior officer, but his merits recommended him to the king, and as captain of Hussars he rendered his company the best disciplined in the army. In the campaign of 1745, his valor was particularly displayed, and though disgraced for a while by the intrigues of general Von Winterfeldt, he rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded the admiration of the king, and of the Prussian army, at the siege of Prague, the battle of Lignitz, and the storming of Torgau. He died in retirement universally regretted, 1786, aged 87. He was of small stature, but the powers of the mind, and the goodness of the heart, atoned for the deficiencies of nature.

ZIMMERMANN, Matthias, a native of Eperies, who became protestant minister at Meissen, and died 1689, aged 64. He published a Dissertation on a Passage in Tertullian — Florilegium Philologico-Historicum, 4to. — Amœnitates Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 4to.

ZIMMERMANN, John George, an eminent physician, born at Brug in the canton of Berne, 8th Dec. 1728. He studied medicine at Gottingen under Haller, in Holland under Gaubius, and at Paris under Senac, and acquired distinction by his profession, and more by his writings. He was noticed by the king of Prussia, and appointed, by the regency of Hanover, physician to the king of England. In the latter part of life he gave way to melancholy, and his infirmities were increased by the insanity of his son, and the death of a beloved daughter who expired in his arms. He died 7th Oct. 1795, aged 66. He wrote a poem on the Destruction of Lisbon by the Earthquake, 1755 — and Physiological Dissertation on Irritability — an Essay on Solitude, 1756, translated into French and English — an Essay on National Pride, 1758. His life was written by his friend Tissot.

ZINER, Christian Frederic, a native of Dresden, who studied painting in England under Boil, 1706. He chiefly excelled in enamel painting, and his portraits of the royal family of England possessed great merit. He died 1767, aged 83.

ZINGHA, queen of Angola, was sister to Gola Bendi the king of the country, who sacrificed all his family to his fears or cruelty. Zingha escaping from the persecution of her brother, ascended the throne at his death, but was soon after dispossessed by the Portuguese. She afterwards retired among a savage nation in the interior of Africa, where she obtained the sovereignty, and in her old age expressed a wish to be converted to christianity. She died Dec. 1664, aged 82.

ZINZENDORF, Nicholas Lewis, count, of an ancient family, originally from Austria, was son of the chamberlain of the king of Poland. He is celebrated as the founder of the sect called Hernhuters, or Moravians, which first began at Bartelsdorf in Upper Lusatia, 1722. The place where these visionaries, who called themselves the brethren, met together, was a forest, which soon grew into a large village, and received the name of Hernhuth, and their doctrines were rapidly spread through Bohemia and Moravia. Some of them came to England, and by the patronage of general Oglethorpe and others, they obtained an act of parliament for the protection of their sect. Their government is patriarchal; they consider the purest precepts of the gospel as the best guides of their conduct; their morals are irreproachable; and in their mutual support of each other, display the noblest virtues of the Christian doctrine. They have, however, been accused by some, according to Cevenna, of impure conduct, and they are charged with the gross crime of having a community of wives. Zinzendorf died at Hernhuth, 1660, aged 60, and was succeeded in the government of the sect by count de Dohna. His life has been written in German by Augustus Spangenberg, 8 vols. 8vo. 1777, and is full of curious and interesting particulars.

ZINZERLING, Justus, a learned antiquarian of Holland in the 17th century. He published Criticorum Juvenilium Promulsio — Jodoci Sinceri Itinerarium Galliæ cum Appendice de Burdegala, a curious and interesting work, &c.

ZISKA or ZISKA, John de Troeznou, a native of Bohemia. He early embraced the military profession and lost one of his eyes in a battle, in consequence of which he was called Ziska. He placed himself at the head of the Hussites who wished to avenge the death of their leader, John Huss; and on the decease of Wenceslaus king of Bohemia in 1414, he opposed the claims of the emperor Sigismund to the throne. Though he lost his other eye by an arrow at the siege of Rabi, he continued the war, and he defeated his enemies at the battle of Aussig on the Elbe, and became master of Bohemia, which he laid waste with fire and sword. Alarmed by the astonishing success of this vigorous leader, Sigismund sent ambassadors to him him to offer him the government of Bohemia on the most honorable conditions; but during the negotiations, he fell a victim to the plague, which began to ravage the country. This happened in 1424, and an honorable epitaph, describing his virtues and services, was placed on his tomb, which, however, was disgracefully erased by the soldiers of Ferdinand II. 1619. The report that he ordered his skin to be tanned, and to be used as a drum to animate his soldiers, is false.

ZIZIM, or ZEM, son of Mahomet II. and brother of Bajazet, was made governor of Lycaonia. On the death of his father, he disputed the throne of the Ottomans with his brother Bajazet, but being defeated, he fled to Egypt, and afterwards passed through Cilicia and Rhodes to France, where he claimed the protection of Charles VIII. He was afterwards delivered into the hands of the pope by the French king; but though demanded on the most flattering conditions by Bajazet, who wished to put him to death, he was kept a prisoner at Rome, where he died 1497, as it is said by poison.

ZOE, fourth wife of the emperor Leo VI. was mother of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, during whose minority, 912, she governed with great wisdom and firmness. She crushed the rebellion of Constantine Ducas, and after making peace with the Saracens, she obliged the Bulgarians to return to their country. Though thus entitled to the gratitude of her son, and the admiration of the people, she was overpowered by the intrigues of the courtiers, and retired to a private station, and died in exile.

ZOE, daughter of Constantine XI. was born 978. She married Argyrus, who ascended the throne after her father; but disgusted, from the most licentious motives, with her husband, she caused him to be strangled, and placed on the throne Michael the Paphlagonian, a goldsmith, whom she married. She was afterwards confined in a monastery, and after Michael's death, she took for her third husband, in her 64th year, Constantine Monomachus. This cruel and debauched prince died eight years after, 1050. — Another, daughter of Stylian, married the emperor Leo, surnamed the Philosopher, and died 21 months after, 893.

ZOILUS, a rhetorician of Amphipolis in Thrace, who criticized so severely the poems of Homer, that he was called Homeromastix, and his name is reproachfully applied to all illiberal critics. He flourished B. C. 270.

ZOLLIKOFER, George Joachim, a native of Switzerland, educated at Bremen and Utrecht. He settled in the Pays de Vaud, and afterwards went to Monstein in the Grisons, and then to Isenburg, and to Leipzig, where he was distinguished as an able divine among the protestants. He died 1758, aged 28, author of a book of devotions — two volumes of sermons, translated into English, &c.

ZONARAS, John, a Greek historian. He held offices of distinction at the court of Constantinople; but at last tired with the world, he assumed the habit of a monk, and died in a monastery in the beginning of the 12th century. He wrote Annals from the Creation of the World to the year 1118, a work of little merit, as the compilation of an ignorant and credulous monk. He closely copies Dio Cassius, though in the affairs of his own times, he mentions facts nowhere else to be found. He wrote also Commentaries on the Apostolic Canons.

ZONEA, Vidor, an Italian mathematician in the 17th century. His inventions and improvements in mechanics were many and valuable, and of them he published an account, called Novo Teatro di Machine ed Edificii, Padua, 1621, folio.

ZOPPO, Mark, a native of Bologna, the disciple and imitator of Andrew Mantegna, in historical and portrait painting. He died 1517, aged 66.

ZOPYRUS, a Persian noble, one of the seven who destroyed the usurper Smerdis. To obtain possession of Babylon for Darius he mangled his body, and thus gained the confidence of the Babylonians, after which he betrayed the town to his countrymen.

ZOROASTER, an ancient philosopher, the founder or reformer of the religion of the Magi. Some call him king of the Bactrians, and others place him in the age of Abraham. As the head of a religious sect among the Persians, he taught his followers the practice of benevolence, as he declared that nothing could be more acceptable to heaven than mutual affection, and the display of philanthropy. The book which contains his religious tenets, and which is divided into 100 articles, has been made known to Europeans by the researches of M. Anquetil, who has published a translation of it in 2 vols. 4to.

ZOSIMUS, St. a Greek, who became pope after Innocent I. 417, and died the following year. Sixteen of his letters are preserved.

ZOSIMUS, author of a Greek history of the Roman emperors to his own times, flourished in the fifth century. Of his works only the five first books, and part of the sixth are extant; best edited at Oxford, 1679, 8vo. and by Cellarius, 1696. His work is written with elegance, but not always with fidelity, and he is very severe against the Christians.

ZOUCH, Richard, a native of Ansley, Wiltshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He studied the law, and afterwards became an advocate in Doctors' Commons, chancellor of Oxford diocese, principal of Alban hall, and judge of the admiralty court. He wrote Cases and Questions resolved in the Civil Law, 8vo. 1652 — Vindication of the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England against sir Edward Coke, a work of merit, and other tracts on jurisprudence, and died 1660.

ZOUST, Gerard, a German particularly distinguished as a portrait painter. He lived for some years in London, where Riley was his pupil, and died 1681. He was happy in his male figures, but he was too faithful a copier of nature, says Granger, to be much in vogue among the ladies. His highest price was 3l. a head.

ZUCCHERO, Taddeo, a painter born 1529 at San-Aguolo-Invado, in the duchy of Urbino. He was noticed by cardinal Farnese who granted him a pension, but his independence produced dissipated habits and hastened his end. He died 1566. His pieces are much admired, though his figures exhibit little variety in the features, and deserve censure for the stiffness observable in the hands and feet.

ZUCCHERO, Frederic, brother to the preceding, was born in the duchy of Urbino, and died at Ancona 1609, aged 63. He studied under his brother, and afterwards settled at Rome where he was patronized by pope Gregory XIII. In consequence of a dispute with some of the officers of the pope's household he drew a picture of calumny in which he represented the features of his enemies with ass's ears, and in such a correct manner that they could not be mistaken, and this so highly offended the sovereign pontiff that he was obliged to fly from Rome. After visiting France, Holland, England and Spain, he returned to Italy, and was honored with the title of knight by the Venetian republic, and afterwards invited to Rome, and placed at the head of an academy of painting with the title of prince. His pieces are much admired, though there appears a stiffness in his figures, and though his draperies are not executed with taste and judgment. He was also eminent as a good architect and sculptor.

ZUINGLIUS, Ulrichus, a zealous reformer, born at Wildehausen in Switzerland 1487. He studied the learned languages at Basil and Berne, and applied himself to philosophy at Vienna, and took his degree of D. D. at Basil 1505. For ten years he acquired popularity as public preacher at Glaris, and in 1516 he was invited to Zurich to undertake the office of minister. The tenets of Luther, which were now propagated in Germany encouraged the Swiss preacher to oppose the sale of indulgencies, and to regard them as impositions from the court of Rome upon the superstitious credulity of the people. Undaunted in the publication of his opinions, he continued to encrease the number of his adherents, and in 1523 he assembled the senate and the clergy of Zurich, and presented before them in 67 propositions the minute articles of his faith. Though opposed by the bishop of Constance, his doctrines were adopted by the full senate, and he was exhorted to preach the word of God, whilst all pastors were forbidden to teach any thing but what could be proved by the gospel. Another synod still more powerfully favored the cause of Zuinglius and of truth, images and reliques were removed from churches, processions were forbidden, and the greater part of the outward worship and ceremonies of the church of Rome was abolished. While, however, successful in the establishment of his doctrines in the canton of Zurich, Zuinglius met with violent opposition in the other members of the Swiss confederacy, and after the fruitless conferences of Baden between Œcolampadius on the part of Zurich, and of Eckius on the part of the catholics, both sides had recourse to arms. In one of the first encounters the great champion of the reformation was slain, 11th Oct. 1531. As a leader Zuinglius displayed great firmness, deep learning, and astonishing presence of mind. Though he opposed the doctrines of the Romish church, he greatly differed from the German reformer, and each unhappily paid little respect to the opinions of the other. His followers continued to encrease and in bearing his name they maintained doctrines on original sin, and on grace, which were rejected by the other seceders from the jurisdiction of Rome. According to Zuinglius, salvation was extended not only to infants, who died before baptism, but to heathens of a virtuous and moral life. Some alterations were afterwards introduced by Calvin, by Beza and others, but whilst the profelytes to these new opinions acquired the name of Calvinists in France, and in other parts of Europe, the Zuinglians who firmly adhered to the tenets of their founder assumed the appellation of Sacramentarians. The works of Zuinglius, as a controversialist were respectable, chiefly written in German, and were comprehended in 4 vols. fol.

ZUMBO, Gasson John, a sculptor, born at Syracuse 1656. He resided for some time at Rome, and then at Florence, where he was much noticed by the grand duke of Tuscany. He afterwards went to Genoa, and then passed to Paris, where he died 1701. The best of his pieces are a nativity, and a descent from the cross.

ZUR-LAUBEN, Beat de, a native of Valais, known as an able negociator from the canton of Zug, at the court of Lewis XIII. He was highly honored for his services by his countrymen, and called the father of his country, and the pillar of religion. He died 1663, aged 66. He wrote an account of his negotiations. His eldest son of the same name, was engaged in the military affairs of his country, and distinguished himself at the battle of Vilmergen, against the Bernese. He died at Zug 1690, aged 74. A nephew of the preceding, of the same name, displayed his knowledge of war at the head of the French armies, and contributed much to the victory of Nerwinde. He died at Ulm, 21st Sep. 1704, aged 48, in consequence of seven wounds, which he had received at the battle of Hochstet.

ZUSTRUS, Lambert, a painter of merit, the pupil of Schwartz, and of Titian. The best of his pieces is the rape of Proserpine, preserved at Paris.

ZWICKER, Daniel, a Socinian who attempted to reconcile the discordant sects among the protestants by the publication of his Irenicon Irenicorum, a work which created him many enemies. He defended himself in two subsequent publications, and died about the 17th century.

ZWINGER, Theodore, a learned physician born at Bichoffitzel in the Turgau. He became professor of moral philosophy and medicine, and died 1588, aged 54. He wrote the Theatre of Human Life, a ponderous work published in 8 vols. fol. Lyons 1656, and afterwards improved and enlarged by his son James who died 1610.

ZWINGER, Theodore, son of James, and grand-son of Theodore, studied medicine which he afterwards abandoned for divinity. During the plague which raged at Basil in 1629, he displayed great humanity, both as a pastor and as a physician. He was author of several controversial tracts, and died 1651, aged 54. His son John became professor of Greek, and public librarian at Basil, and distinguished himself by his learning. He died 1696.

ZWINGER, Theodore, son of John just mentioned, was professor of eloquence and medicine at Basil where he he died 1724. He published Theatrum Botanicum, in German, fol. — Fasciculus Dissertationum, 4to. Triga Dissertationum — a Latin and German Dictionary — some medical works, &c. His brother John Rodolphus was professor of divinity at Basil, and died there 1708, aged 48. He wrote sermons — tracts — and the Hope of Israel, in German.

ZYBIUS, Otho, a jesuit, born at Utrecht. He wrote the Lives of Saints — Cameracum Obsidione Liberatum, a poem, &c. and died at Malines 15th Aug. 1656, aged 88.

ZYPEUS, or VANDEN ZYPE, Francis, a native of Malines. His great knowledge of jurisprudence was admired, and rewarded by le Mire, bishop of Antwerp, who appointed him his secretary, and gave him the place of a canon, and of an archdeacon of his church. He is author of some works of merit on the law, especially Analytica Enarratio Juris Pontificii Novi — Consultationes Canonice — Notitiæ Juris Belgici — De Jurisdictione Ecclesiasticâ, & Civili, &c. collected together in 2 vols. fol. This learned man, equally respectable in private life, died at Antwerp 1650, aged 71. His brother Henry, was an ecclesiastic, and became abbot of St. Andrew near Bruges. He died 1659, aged 83. He was author of several works, the best known of which is Sanctus Gregorius Magnus, &c. 1611, 8vo. in which, with more learning than wisdom, he proves that Gregory, who was a Roman pontiff, was of the order of the Benedictines.
